RESOURCES FOR TALKING WITH STUDENTS ABOUT THE ELECTION RESULTS

General Resources
A week after the elections, students and teachers are still processing what the election results may mean for them, their families and their communities. The following websites and organizations provide some strategies for being in a classroom post-election and may be a useful tool for educators.

- Brown University Sheridan Center, Teaching After the U.S. Election, https://www.brown.edu/about/administration/sheridan-center/
- Center for Research on Learning and Teaching, Returning to the Classroom After the Election, http://www.crlt.umich.edu/
- WNYC, How to Talk About the Election with Students, http://www.wnyc.org/story/students-teachers-presidential-election-trump-clinton/

Resources About Immigration
Several immigrant rights organizations have prepared one-pagers about what the election may mean for immigrants, and in particular to provide information to young people who have been granted a work permit through the DACA (Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals) program created by the Obama administration. One such information sheet created by the National Immigrant Justice Center can be found at http://bit.ly/2f2o980.

Prepared by the Boston College Center for Human Rights & International Justice
www.bc.edu/humanrights
November 22, 2016