SC584-01 – SOCIOLOGICAL ROOTS OF WAR

Ritchie Lowry - Fall 2009
Wednesdays - Noon to 2:30 p.m. – 415 McGuinn

Format & Content of Seminar

☛ This seminar will explore the historical change in, nature and current character of war and the use of military power in contemporary society. Of particular interest will be the proper and improper uses of war and force from both utilitarian and ethical perspectives. Specific topics and issues are listed below. We will also consider ways of addressing the problems of war and militarism in contemporary society, particularly through the social, economic and political empowerment of the average citizen and nonmilitary alternatives to war.

☛ We will begin the semester’s first several weeks reading and responding to the shared readings below. In addition, material will be provided in course about the changing nature of warfare and related topics. You should also be generating your own reading and reference list for a term project. During the first week, everyone should select a topic for research and analysis during the semester. Rather than asking seminar participants to write a 30-page term paper by the end of the course, you will be asked to write three shorter, sequential papers during the semester. About a third of the way through the course, the first 10-page, double-spaced paper will be due which discusses the significance and nature of the selected topic. This will be followed by a second paper that analyzes the selected topic. At the end of the semester, a final paper will draw conclusions from each of the first two papers. We will be sharing each of these papers in class with one another in order to get the widest possible input. Since this is a small class that depends upon the widest possible involvement of all, please let me know if you have to miss a meeting for health or other reasons.
