Rick Hoyt (front) demonstrates EagleEyes for a group of rehabilitation professionals and people with disabilities. The demonstration was the December offering in the monthly Easter Seal Product Spotlight Series at the Easter Seal Assistive Technology Center in Worcester. EagleEyes allows individuals with disabilities to control a computer with their eyes. Developed at Boston College by computer scientist James Gips, the system is being tested by children with disabilities at the BC campus school.