

Graduate Programs in Higher Education Administration

Work at the cutting edge of research and practice in higher education. The Lynch School's graduate programs in Higher Education will prepare you for a dynamic career in administration and management.

In today's volatile economy, colleges and universities need strong, visionary leadership. Administrators with skills, experience, and insight can create rewarding careers—and affect lasting change.

The graduate programs in Higher Education Administration at the Lynch School combine rigorous academics with focused internship opportunities to provide a strong foundation in administration. Home to the Center for International Higher Education and the Center for Catholic Education, the Lynch School offers unique opportunities for involvement in cutting-edge research.

The master's program in higher education prepares students for entry-level and middle-management positions in student affairs and in other professional areas in colleges, universities, community colleges, and policy-making organizations. The doctoral program prepares experienced practitioners for senior administrative and policy-making posts, and careers in teaching and research.

Boston College is the quintessential place to focus on higher education. With a long tradition of student affairs and formation initiatives, the Lynch School provides the exposure, experience, and support needed to succeed both academically and professionally. It is truly a dynamic community of ideas, action, and cooperative growth.
