Patients with chronic diseases and their families frequently manage their day-to-day health in today’s complex health care delivery system. MARGARET GREY, a pediatric nurse practitioner with an expertise in diabetes, knows how nursing can enhance the way individuals and their families manage such conditions. She will share leadership tips for advancing science and translating science into practice. Grey will also address the resources and hurdles that families face in self-managing chronic conditions, the processes and practice involved, and expectations for the quality of life and health.
