Earth and Environmental Sciences Courses: Fall 2021

EESC111001 Geology of National Parks Becker, Richard Fall 2021
U.S. National Parks give us the perfect opportunity to explore and discuss fundamental geological concepts. How was the Grand Canyon carved out by a river? How are volcanoes in Hawaii different from those in Katmai National Park, and what do they tell us about plate tectonics? How did glaciers shape Acadia National Park? Which parks are most susceptible to earthquakes and why? While considering various National Parks, as well as some State Parks and/or parks in other countries, basic modern scientific methods in the earth sciences will be discussed and explored.

EESC111501 Astronomy Kuchar, Thomas A Fall 2021
Astronomical observations and theories date back to the beginning of recorded history. The development of astronomy is closely tied to the growth of physics, mathematics, philosophy, and theology. Emphasis is on large-scale concepts and on how we know what we know about the stars, our galaxy, and the universe. The course covers these discoveries and ideas from the earliest days of astronomy to many of the recent, exciting advances.

EESC116801 Environmental Geosciences: Earth Processes and Risks Behn, Mark D Fall 2021
This course may be taken independently of EESC1167. This course will explore the dynamic processes operating on and within the earth and how those processes can impact humans. We will explore the nature of natural disasters, including river and coastal flooding, volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, landslides, severe storms, climate changes, and bombardment by rare extraterrestrial objects. Emphasis will be placed on understanding the current science used to predict the occurrences of these disasters, how accurate those predictions are, and the associated mitigation practices.

EESC117001 Rivers and the Environment Snyder, Noah P Fall 2021
Scientific understanding of rivers is vital to address many of today's environmental challenges. Rivers transport and distribute water, sediment, nutrients, and contaminants throughout the landscape. They provide habitat and migration pathways for countless aquatic species. Rivers supply fresh water, power generation, and recreational opportunities to much of the world's human populations. We will learn about the geological, hydrological, and biological processes that are important to rivers and watersheds, and how knowledge of these processes aids our ability to manage, protect, and restore these systems.

This core course provides a broad and modern presentation of the major topics and principles of Earth Science. The lectures will cover all the fundamental subjects of geology, with emphasis on earth materials such as minerals, rocks and internal and external Earth processes, with a brief overview of important aspects of Earth history. The labs will involve hands-on work studying minerals, igneous rocks, sedimentary rocks, metamorphic rocks, viscosity, weathering and running water, formation of ripples and sand dunes, plate tectonics, fossils, and earthquakes, in addition to a local field geology trip during lab time. Additional topics may be covered if time allows.

Crisis and Storytelling in the Age of Climate Change DEPT
Fall 2021
This is a Complex Problems course and is open to Freshman only. The realities of a changing climate, including intensified extreme weather events, rising sea levels, and strengthening heat waves and droughts, are already being felt by frontline communities around the world. The course focuses both on hearing stories about climate change as told by climate writers, scientists, and members of frontline communities, and telling these stories ourselves. We will examine storytelling as it works across mediums and genres from literature to scientific data visualizations, and consider what it means to write an essay, produce a graph, create a podcast, or make a film. Students in the course will read, watch, and analyze examples of climate storytelling, broadly defined, and produce their own personal essays, infographics, podcasts, and/or films. Marine Conservation Science Ofen, Vena
This course explores the threats to marine diversity, and the ways in which we can preserve diversity. Covering principles from marine science, ecology and conservation biology, we ask what role does diversity play in marine ecosystems, and what are the consequences of ecosystem function and services. We investigate major threats to marine diversity including marine pollution, species invasion, commercial fishing, and climate change impacts.

Isotope Geochemistry and Geochronology Baxter, Ethan
Fall 2021
This course will introduce the various isotopic methods that are used in the Earth Sciences. Topics will include: (1) radiogenic isotopes in geochronology and petrogenesis, including U-Th-Pb, K-Ar, Rb-Sr, and Sm-Nd, (2) light stable isotopes in geology, biogeochemistry, and paleothermometry, including C, H, O, N, and S, and (3) non-traditional stable isotopes in biogeochemistry, oceanography, and cosmochemistry including Fe, Mo, Cu, Ni, and Ca. We will emphasize the geochemical behavior, analytical methods, and specific applications of these isotopes in systems in geology.

Fall 2021
This course is similar and concurrent with EESC378 but reserved for graduate students. The emphasis will be on learning the techniques of polarizing light microscopy (PLM) and on petrology and petrography of igneous and metamorphic rocks. Lectures on petrology of how these rocks form and how they relate to the plate tectonic environments will be integrated with the laboratory. Phase diagrams will be used to help better understand the origin of igneous rocks whereas metamorphic facies reactions will be applied to understanding of progressive and retrograde metamorphic processes.

Climate Change Debates Shakun, Jeremy D
Fall 2021
This advanced seminar seeks to provide an overview of the science of global change and a critical evaluation of the literature through a survey of current scientific debates. We will cover a wide range of topics from radiative forcing, oceans, atmosphere, cryosphere, paleoclimate, biological feedbacks, and impacts. Students will be expected to read papers and lead discussions, write assessments of each climate debate, and prepare a final term paper evaluating the scientific consensus on climate change in the context of the debates we cover.

Alternative Energy Krones, Jonathan S Fall 2021
Modern civilization relies upon energy to support nearly all aspects of social and economic activity. Historically, this energy has come from fossil fuels (coal, oil, and natural gas). Important questions concerning the availability and societal and environmental impacts of these energy sources have contributed to an increasing interest in the development of alternative energy technologies (e.g., solar, wind, geothermal, biomass, tidal and wave). Through an interdisciplinary lens, this course will explore the dynamics of the current energy transition with a particular focus on sustainable energy systems and alternative energy resources. Students will be introduced to quantitative, engineering methods for energy modeling and technology selection in the context of the economic, political, and environmental dimensions of both conventional and alternative energy resources.

Glacial and Pleistocene Geology Becker, Richard Fall 2021
This course will explore three topics: the physics of glaciers, the glacial deposits of the last ice age, and the history of the Pleistocene epoch. Students will learn how mass and energy fluxes govern the behavior of glaciers; how climate and the physical properties of ice govern the formation and evolution of glacial landscapes; and how we can infer Pleistocene paleoclimatic and paleoglaciology from those landscapes. The course will include a field trip. A fundamental goal of the course will be providing students with a systematic understanding of how glacial landforms, glacialogy, and glacial history vary across continental-scale landscapes.

EESC112501
Exploring Earth History
Becker, Richard
Spring 2022
“The earth is not finished, but is now being and will forever be remade.” C.R. Van Hise (1898)
The objective of this course is to describe the history of the earth and the development of life on Earth during the last 4.6 billion years, especially within North America. Major biological and physical events will be revealed by interpretation of the rock record. The use of animations and demonstrations will enhance your understanding of some major topics.

Origin and Evolution of Life
Strother, Paul K
Spring 2022
This course explores current theories about the origins of life, beginning with the original hypothesis of the Russian biochemist A.I. Oparin. Darwin’s theory of evolution is emphasized, but many different components of the natural sciences touch upon this topic. The course lectures include the study of the oldest fossils, life in extreme habitats, cellular biology, prebiotic molecules, and the search for life on other planets.

Making the Modern World: Design, Ethics, and Engineering Powell, Russell C Spring 2022
Together we will consider how engineers and other stakeholders navigate risks related to industrial and environmental disasters; balance financial, technological, and regulatory pressures associated with complex socio-technical problems; and negotiate technical and political liabilities surrounding artificial intelligence, surveillance, and climate adaptation. Students will collaborate on group design projects based on human-centered engineering. Engineering systems present pressing technical, ethical, and moral problems that we must grapple with as engaged global citizens. In this class students will explore the social, cultural, and institutional history of engineering; learn foundational skills in quantitative analysis of real-world engineering designs; and understand the political, environmental, economic, and ethical tradeoffs associated with building the modern world.

Agroecology: The Science of Sustainable Agriculture Pisani Gareau, Tara Spring 2022
Conventional agriculture, while responsible for enormous increases in yield, has undermined the natural resources that support agricultural yield and ecosystem services. Yet there is a pressing need to maintain yield in the face of climate change. How can we meet the food needs of a growing human population without clearing more forests, polluting rivers and the atmosphere, overdrawing from aquifers, and threatening the existence of wild species? In this course we will learn how the principles of ecology can be applied to the design, management, and analysis of agroecosystems and agricultural landscapes with the goal of creating a sustainable food system.

Paleobiology Strother, Paul K Spring 2022

Paleobiology is the study of evolution based on Paleontology, the fossil record of life through geologic time. The course begins with the origins of life and early evolution during the Precambrian Eon, when all major domains of life were established. The rise of plants and animals, beginning about 500 million years ago, is followed by the study of macroevolution and patterns of evolution through time. Lecture emphasizes paleobiology and environmental evolution; laboratory provides direct observation of fossils including basic morphology and phylogeny. The class may include an extended weekend field trip to Nova Scotia to visit several fossil localities.

Environmental Data Exploration and Analysis Palevsky, Hilary I Spring 2022

Earth and environmental science increasingly depends on scientific programming to explore and analyze large datasets from in situ and autonomous observations, satellite remote sensing, and numerical model output. In this course, students will learn to use MATLAB to visualize earth system data across broad spatial and temporal scales in maps and time-series plots and apply statistical tools to analyze trends and variability in their datasets. Students will also learn to critically assess datasets and to select and justify appropriate data sources and analytical methods to address scientific questions about earth system processes. Students will practice these skills in a series of data analysis assignments focused on regional and global climate data and will apply them in a team-based final research project.

Fall 2021
Real Estate and Urban Action is a class in which students explore the interdisciplinary fields that are engaged in neighborhood revitalization. The course uses the transformation of the failed Columbia Point housing project (Dorchester, MA) into Harbor Point, a successful mixed income neighborhood, as a core teaching case study, highlighting how successful redevelopment addresses the social and economic needs of community residents. Classes include guest lectures from developers, public planning officials, and supportive services experts on the social, cultural, and political factors critical to transforming distressed neighborhoods into safe and economically viable neighborhoods. It is a practical course,

Geographic Information Systems for Planning and Decision-Making Cohen, Will W Fall 2021
Large quantities of information are available to describe our social and physical environment with high detail, but making sense of this data requires specialized skill sets. Geographic Information Systems (GIS) is a general approach to analysis and is a powerful set of tools for understanding complex problems or for making a compelling argument about issues grounded in the physical or social environment. It is widely used in the public and private sectors. This course will introduce students to the use of GIS and representation as a means of looking at and representing spatial data. Students will learn how to perform the three broad steps of spatial analysis: 1) collecting and organizing data, 2) analyzing this data for appropriate patterns, and 3) using software to represent data on maps to support decision making.

ECON221301 Economics of Health Policy DEPT Fall 2021
This course builds on fundamental concepts from Principles to apply economic reasoning to health policy issues. We will develop some tools for thinking critically about health economics data, and then delve into the history and institutional details of health policy in the United States. The rest of the course is devoted to the economics behind a variety of health policy questions: how could policymakers use cost-effectiveness analysis when deciding whether to adopt new health care technology? How can the economics of externalities inform policies to implement health care? Why do we give patents to pharmaceutical companies when we know that monopolies create deadweight loss? Why do health economists oppose the tax deduction for employer-sponsored health insurance plans? How did Medicare’s individual health insurance mandate affect insurance markets, and what should we expect now that the mandate has been repealed? How can information asymmetries result in low-quality health care? Why does the United States spend so much more than other countries on health care, and what do we gain from that additional spending?

Game Theory in Economics Sharunova, Vera

This course is an introduction to game theory. Game theory consists of a coherent set of concepts and analytical tools to examine interactive or strategic situations between people, that is, situations where the well being of one actor depends not only what s/he does but also on what others do. Hence in deciding how best to act, each person needs to consider how others are likely to act as well. Game theory has become a widely used tool of analysis in a wide range of disciplines, including economics, business, political science, law, and international relations.

Economies of Inequality Sanzenbacher, Geoffrey T Fall 2021

The course will provide both a theoretical and empirical analysis of economic inequality. This will include analysis and discussion of recent trends in inequality and an examination of the economic causes and consequences of inequality. Specific attention will be paid to the difference between inequality of economic outcomes (e.g., employment status, earnings, and occupation) and inequality of economic opportunity. The course will also touch on economic policy, including discussions of programs designed to combat inequality of outcomes, like welfare and food stamps, as well as those designed to combat inequality of opportunity, like Head Start. Money and Financial Markets Kazemi, Hossein S Fall 2021

This course covers topics such as the significance and multiple functions of money in the economy, the behavior of interest rates, the banking system, financial markets, and the management of financial institutions. This course further covers the Federal Reserve System and the conduct of monetary policy, different asset classes, the foreign exchange market, and the international financial system. There is a heavy emphasis on use of market data and the analysis of economic releases—earnings reports, government policy statements, etc.—to provide a comprehensive introduction to the subject. Moreover, through an extensive use of Bloomberg in this class students learn how to access and analyze data and economic releases to provide a window into how modern practitioners in the discipline analyze financial markets.

Advertising and Media Markets: Advanced Research Methods Mortimer, Julie H Fall 2021

Extensive research project. This course develops advanced research methods to study the advertising and media markets. The goal of the course is to provide hands-on experience with advanced research methods, including the ability to analyze and critique previous research and to identify important research questions. The course is designed primarily for junior economics majors who are interested in writing a senior thesis, or for junior and senior economics majors anticipating quantitative work in economics or marketing after graduation. Methods that are taught include theoretical tools from industrial organization, such as game theoretic models of imperfect competition, pricing, and entry, as well as statistical and empirical methods of analysis using data on advertising and media programming choices. Questions addressed in the course include the following: What is the impact of advertising on product markets? How do advertisers compete for air time, both across and within industries?

Monetary Theory and Policy Kazemi, Hossein S
Fall 2021
This course is an analysis of how the operation and behavior of financial markets are influenced by monetary policy, the actions taken by the Federal Reserve to promote full employment, price stability, and moderate long-term interest rates. Emphasis is placed on studying the interaction between financial intermediaries (e.g., commercial banks, investment banks, mutual funds, hedge funds, etc.) and a nation's central bank. Students are introduced to the modern theories of the demand for and supply of money, as well as their implications for economic activity, the cost of living, employment, and the conduct of monetary policy. Particular emphasis is given to recent Fed policy, including Quantitative Easing and Quantitative Tightening and the impact of these policies on asset prices and long-term interest rates. Furthermore, through an extensive use of Bloomberg in this class students learn how to analyze the impact of these and other Fed policies on the U.S. economy and financial markets to provide a window into how modern practitioners in the discipline follow and respond to changes in U.S. monetary policy.

Applied Health Economics DEPT Fall 2021

A perennial health policy debate concerns the proper role of government in the allocation of health care. The first fundamental theorem of welfare economics states that (under certain assumptions) markets result in efficient allocations, so one might expect most economists favor minimal government involvement in allocating health care. We will begin by studying economic theories about why health care markets may be inefficient, along with the empirical evidence regarding those theories. As the course progresses, our emphasis will shift: in groups, students will use publicly-available data to write and present a research paper investigating a policy-relevant health economics question. ECON772001
Math for Economists Ireland, Peter N Fall 2021

"Economics studies the efficient allocation of scarce resources." It follows almost immediately from this definition that while verbal and graphical analyses are often helpful too, economists derive their sharpest and most powerful results by setting up and solving constrained (because resources are "scarce") optimization (because allocations should be "efficient") problems. Hence, this course introduces first-year graduate students to variety of techniques for doing just that: setting up and solving constrained optimization problems. Specific methods covered include those based on the Kuhn-Tucker and envelope theorems, the maximum principle, and dynamic programming. Note that since this is a "math for economists course", its emphasis is not so much on stating and proving theorems but on developing an intuitive understanding of how and why each method works and determining when one particular approach may be easier or more convenient than all others to apply to a specific problem.

Industrial Organization I
Mortimer, Julie
Fall 2021
In this course, we study imperfect competition among firms, emphasizing empirical work. We learn how to implement empirical methods commonly used in Industrial Organization (IO), and how to read, and ultimately write, papers in empirical IO. Topics covered include demand estimation, entry, auctions, bundling, vertical control and contractual arrangements, retailing and inventories, U.S. merger policy, health markets, and others as time allows. Each topic is organized around recent empirical work. Throughout, we consider the importance of identification in empirical studies.

Game Theory and Applications
Ekmemek, Mehmet
Fall 2021
In this elective advanced Graduate Class, we will cover many topics and problems that fall under the category game theory with more emphasis on dynamic games and repeated games. Although we will study some topics of dynamic games with complete information, there will be a disproportionate weight on problems with asymmetric information, and problems in which there are elements related to learning. More specifically, we will study Repeated Games, Reputation Games, Bargaining, Experimentation and Information Aggregation. Students should have a strong background in Mathematical tools used in economics, and should have taken an advanced undergraduate course in Game Theory, and/or first year Graduate Micro sequence.

Real Estate and Urban Action McCullagh, Neil P
Spring 2022
Real Estate and Urban Action is a class in which students explore the inter disciplinary fields that are engaged in neighborhood revitalization. The course uses the transformation of the failed Columbia Point housing project (Dorchester, MA) into Harbor Point, a successful mixed income neighborhood, as a core teaching case study, highlighting how successful redevelopment addresses the social and economic needs of community residents. Classes include guest lectures from developers, public planning officials, and supportive services experts on the social, cultural, and political factors critical to transforming distressed neighborhoods into safe and economically viable neighborhoods. It is a practical course, in which students gain experience through field trips and interactions with real estate and supportive services professionals, culminating in a team neighborhood transformation proposal.

ECON220801
Economic Justice Piderit, John Spring 2022
The normal focus of economics is on efficiency in the development and use of scarce resources as well as the determination of rewards paid to factors of production such as labor and capital. In some economics courses attention is given to a country's distribution of income, although usually without any economic or philosophical justification for what constitutes a fair distribution of income. This course identifies guiding principles that are rooted in a vibrant Judeo-Christian tradition stemming from the Old and New Testament. These principles constitute the foundation for general norms that help identify components of the common good of a society and that guide the distribution of goods among individual nation states, between generations, and between people of one century with people of future centuries. They also suggest how to balance rewards for people or firms that develop new products, and they yield broad boundaries within which economies should function to protect the environment. Finally, any just society requires much more than free markets and a system of law and governance. The course proposes an ethical code for workers in free-market societies, a code based on making sure that all people have reasonable economic resources to pursue basic human goods in their personal and community lives.

Geographic Information Systems for Planning and Decision-Making
Spring 2022
Large quantities of information are available to describe our social and physical environment with high detail, but making sense of this data requires specialized skill sets. Geographic Information Systems (GIS) is a general approach to analysis and is a powerful set of tools for understanding complex problems or for making a compelling argument about issues grounded in the physical or social environment. It is widely used in the public and private sectors. This course will introduce students to the use of GIS and representation as a means of looking at and representing spatial data. Students will learn how to perform the three broad steps of spatial analysis: 1) collecting and organizing data, 2) analyzing this data for appropriate patterns, and 3) using software to represent data on maps to support decision making.

Topics in Macroeconomic Forecasting DEPT
Spring 2022
Forecasting is a very important activity. Economists forecast the macroeconomy and these forecasts provide information that will help the economy to thrive. Business firms must also forecast the macroeconomy. All of the problems covered in this course can be set-up as special cases of a state-space model. This course is devoted to forecasting the macroeconomy. Topics that will be covered in this course are: single equation ARIMA processes; linear algebra, Vector autoregressions (VARs); state-space models; using state-space models to forecast the economy when the state variables are observed; errors-in-variables, dynamic factor models; using state-space models when the state variables are unobserved, that is using dynamic factor models; dynamic factor models applied to several different macroeconomic models from the literature.

This course is an introduction to game theory. Game theory consists of a coherent set of concepts and analytical tools to examine interactive or strategic situations between people, that is, situations where the well being of one actor depends not only what s/he does but also on what others do. Hence in deciding how best to act, each person needs to consider how others are likely to act as well. Game theory has become a widely used tool of analysis in a wide range of disciplines, including economics, business, political science, law, and international relations.

Game Theory in Economics Shanunova, Vera
Spring 2022
This course is an introduction to game theory. Game theory consists of a coherent set of concepts and analytical tools to examine interactive or strategic situations between people, that is, situations where the well being of one actor depends not only what s/he does but also on what others do. Hence in deciding how best to act, each person needs to consider how others are likely to act as well. Game theory has become a widely used tool of analysis in a wide range of disciplines, including economics, business, political science, law, and international relations.

Evolutionary Economics Cox, Donald
Spring 2022
This course uses evolutionary biology to better understand the psychology of preferences, a central concept in economics. Why are people risk averse? Impatient? What explains novelty seeking, habits, addictions? What makes parents provide for children? We will use evolutionary thinking to explore these and a host of other diverse topics: violence, adolescent risk taking, sexual behavior, mating preferences, marriage and divorce, rearing and investing in children, extended families, trade and specialization, cooperation and conflict, culs and gangs, religion, and interactions between genetic and cultural forces. This course has an intensive research and writing requirement and enrollment is limited. You should be comfortable using Stata.

Economies of Inequality Sanzenbacher, Geoffrey T Spring 2022
This course will provide both a theoretical and empirical analysis of economic inequality. This will include analysis and discussion of recent trends in inequality and an examination of the economic causes and consequences of inequality. Specific attention will be paid to the difference between inequality of economic outcomes (e.g., employment status, earnings, and occupation) and inequality of economic opportunity. The course will also touch on economic policy, including discussions of programs designed to combat inequality of outcomes, like welfare and food stamps, as well as those designed to combat inequality of opportunity, like Head Start. Prerequisites: micro theory and econometrics.

Money and Financial Markets Kazemi, Hossein S
Spring 2022
This course covers topics such as the significance and multiple functions of money in the economy, the behavior of interest rates, the banking system, financial markets, and the management of financial institutions. This course further covers the Federal Reserve System and the conduct of monetary policy, different asset classes, the foreign exchange market, and the international financial system. There is a heavy emphasis on use of market data and the analysis of economic releases—earnings reports, government policy statements, etc.—to provide a comprehensive introduction to the subject. Moreover, through an extensive use of Bloomberg in this class students learn how to access and analyze data and economic releases to provide a window into how modern practitioners in the discipline analyze financial markets.

Experimental Economics Coffman, Lucas
Spring 2022
This course is for anyone who wants to be able to answer questions using experiments. This course is an introduction to experimental methods, particularly those developed by economists. We will discuss in detail all of the steps of an experiment, from design, measurement and randomization, to cost and power analyses. This is a strictly a methods course; the experiments we discuss are chosen to give a broad understanding of experimental methods, not a foundation of famous experimental results. Nonetheless, we will cover experiments in a variety of interesting fields: behavioral economics, economics of developing countries, discrimination, labor economics, cognitive and social psychology, and more. There are two main value-adds from this course. First, you will be equipped to design and run an experiment to answer important questions. Second, in understanding what the optimal experimental design should look like, you will be armed with better lenses through which to view naturally existing data.

Monetary Theory and Policy Kazemi, Hossein S
Spring 2022
This course is an analysis of how the operation and behavior of financial markets are influenced by monetary policy, the actions taken by the Federal Reserve to promote full employment, price stability, and moderate long-term interest rates. Emphasis is placed on studying the interaction between financial intermediaries (e.g., commercial banks, investment banks, mutual funds, hedge funds, etc.) and a nation's central bank. Students are introduced to the modern theories of the demand for and supply of money, as well as their implications for economic activity, the cost of living, employment, and the conduct of monetary policy. Particular emphasis is given to recent Fed policy, including Quantitative Easing and Quantitative Tightening and the impact of these policies on asset prices and long-term interest rates. Furthermore, through an extensive use of Bloomberg in this class students learn how to analyze the impact of these and other Fed policies on the U.S. economy and financial markets to provide a window into how modern practitioners in the discipline follow and respond to changes in U.S. monetary policy.

For Stone Tools to Robots: Economic Growth and Development, Guerrero, Pablo A Spring 2022
This class explores economic growth over the past millennia. For most of its history, humanity did not experience the type and quality of life, as we know it today (e.g., electricity, running water, medicine, telecommunications, and transport). It is only during the second half of the 18thcentury when Europe (and later U.S.) started to see economic growth. This growth started with the Industrial Revolution. In the first part of the course, we will study models that explain why economic growth is such a recent phenomenon. We will rely on models such as those proposed by Malthus to understand why the world did not grow at all for most of 5 millennia.

We will also explore models that help us to understand the explosive economic growth experienced by the U.S. in the 19thand 20thcenturies (and other countries more recently). As a by-product, there will be some discussion on the recent slowdown affecting most Western economies (the so-called Secular Stagnation). Importantly, we will talk about the increasingly reliance on automation for production in the so-called 4thIndustrial Revolution. That is, the impact automation may have on employment, welfare, and society. For example, we will explore how automation is contributing to inequality. A crucial part of the course is to understand how research and development (R&D) and innovation contribute to growth.

Therefore, the second part of the course will be devoted to study R&D and the aggregate (macro) level but also at the industry level. We will use case studies in, for example, the pharmaceutical sector to study why R&D is such a crucial factor for growth but also difficult to implement and predict its impact on firms and ultimately on the economy. We will study the current development of vaccines and treatments for Covid-19. In addition, we also analyze the role of automation and big data (data mining, and machine learning) in R&D. As will become clear, programming is a vital skill in the 4thIndustrial Revolution. To prepare students for this shifting labor landscape, students will learn Python to manipulate data and solve models. An example of this is to compute productivity using data from national accounts for different countries.

After developing and studying the details of consumer decision-making under uncertainty, it uses that general framework as a basis for understanding both equilibrium and no-arbitrage theories of securities pricing, including traditional models like the capital asset pricing model (CAPM), newer Arrow-Debreu theories, and, if time permits, arbitrage pricing theory (APT), the consumption capital asset pricing model (CCAPM), and martingale pricing methods.

Machine Learning for Economics Evren, Haydar E Spring 2022
One of the defining features of the world around us today is the ever-increasing amount of data that describe our daily lives. This "big data" phenomenon, as it became known, has led to developing of new methods, called "machine learning," that allow high-dimensional statistical analysis in ways that were either impossible or infeasible for classical statistical methods, such as regression analysis. The goal of this course is to provide students with an introduction to machine learning in a framework way that makes it applicable to causal economic analysis.

While we will cover the necessary theoretical foundations, the emphasis will be placed on application and learning how and when to use these new methods, and what are their pros and cons compared to classical methods of statistical analysis.

This course provides an overview of recent research in energy and environmental economics, with an emphasis on connecting policy questions of interest to available data and econometric methods. In the context of specific markets, we will first review the theoretical justifications for government intervention. We will then turn to the empirical evidence to see what recent economic scholarship has to say about a variety of energy policy questions, including: Should we ban fracking? Do oil pipelines reduce property values? What is the best way to promote renewable energy? Should we be more energy efficient? Students will be required to read and discuss academic articles each week, as well as write an empirical term paper. Credits: 0

First-Year Human-Centered Engineering Reflection 1 Gaudette, Glenn R
Spring 2022
Students will engage in weekly reflection sessions designed to integrate experiences in the HCE classroom with broader questions about the relationship between engineering, design, and society. Drawing on a variety of reflection practices, students will consider the role of engineering knowledge in complex sociotechnical systems, what it means to do human-centered engineering for the common good, the moral and ethical dimensions of engineering practice, and their own formation as students and individuals.

ENGR110101
Introduction to Human-Centered Engineering Hira, Avneet
Spring 2022
In this course, we will learn about and practice engineering methods to tackle design problems through a human-centered lens. These methods include introductory work with: mathematical models, statistics, physical prototyping, computer-aided design, decision-making approaches, and observation and interview techniques. We will learn how these methods can be employed while working on a design problem, including problem formulation, data analysis, design trade-offs, concept selection, and design deployment. At the end of this course, we will have a working understanding of how human-centered engineers think and work.

Engineering Analysis Lab Ranger, Bryan J
Spring 2022
In this course, students will apply integral calculus and scientific principles to develop analytical solutions for engineering problems. Students will learn how to devise experiments, collect and analyze data, and conduct basic error analysis. The course will be structured as individual experimental modules to get hands-on experience with fundamental instruments including power supplies, sensors, electromechanical components, and computer-based data acquisition systems. Following this course, students will be equipped to apply quantitative analytical techniques to a variety of practical engineering problems.

Engineering Computation and Programming Govindasamy, Siddharten
Spring 2022
In this course, students will be introduced to computational tools used in engineering through the MATLAB computing and programming environment. Students will also learn and apply fundamental concepts from linear algebra to solve engineering problems computationally. Topics to be introduced include loops, functions, arrays, matrices, and vectors. Students will be expected to complete weekly assignments and a final project in which students will use the MATLAB computing environment to solve an appropriately scoped engineering problem.

Topics in Computer Science: Digital Signal Processing Govindasamy, Siddharten
Spring 2022
From mobile telephones, to fitness monitors, medical imaging devices, environmental sensors and more, systems that process digital signals are ubiquitous in the modern world. In this course, students will learn the conceptual ideas in digital signal processing such as sampling, Fourier Transforms, and time-frequency analysis. Applications in audio and biomedical signal processing will be used extensively. The course will culminate in a project where students will get to further their understanding of the fundamental concepts in areas such as image processing, communications, and biomedical signal processing.

English Courses: Fall 2021
ENGL100901
First Year Writing Seminar/English Language Learners
Imre, Kristin
Fall 2021
Limited to 15. Students place into the course after taking a writing assessment. Satisfies Core requirement for: Writing. Designed for students whose first language is not English, this course aims to develop the writing skills necessary for success at Boston College. Students will gain practice in the writing of academic essays, focusing on a range of English rhetorical styles from narrative to research. The composition process from brainstorming, drafting, revision, and editing will be considered. Grammar is taught in the context of student-generated writing. This course may be taken in place of ENGL1010, First Year Writing Seminar, and fulfills the Writing Core requirement. Students place into this course based on the English placement exam taken in late August.

In Literature Core, students explore the principal motives which prompt people to read literature: to assemble and assess the shape and values of one’s own culture, to discover alternative ways of looking at the world, to gain insight into issues of permanent human importance as well as issues of contemporary urgency, and to enjoy the linguistic and formal satisfactions of literary art. Literature Core will strive to develop the student’s capacity to read and write with clarity and engagement, to allow for that dialogue between the past and present we call history, and to provide an introduction to literary genres. ENGL109301
An Introduction to Modern Irish I Caillraith, Sean R. Songer, Kristen A Fall 2021
This course continues in second semester as ENGL1094. This course offers beginners an enjoyable introduction to the language and culture of Ireland. We'll learn how to speak basic Irish Gaelic, including talking in the present tense about who you are, where you live, your family, your daily life, and things you like to do. We will learn songs from the rich sean-nos (old-style) singing tradition. This course counts towards your Irish Studies minor, and one towards your English major. In the spring semester, you can build on what you've gained and, if you wish, satisfy the Morrissey College of Arts and Sciences language proficiency requirement by completing the four-course cycle the following year.

ENGL111001
First Year Writing Seminar: From Slavery to Mass Incarceration DeRosa, Marla C Fall 2021
Formerly Titled: First Year Writing Seminar: Power, Race and Inequality in the Criminal Justice System. This section of the First-Year Writing Seminar is centered around a book called Just Mercy by Bryan Stevenson. The book focuses on Stevenson's work with the criminal justice system and the organization he founded called the Equal Justice Initiative. The book raises questions about power, race, equality, justice, and the common good within the U.S. legal system for which there are no easy answers. Students will identify one of these issues/questions from the book and delve more deeply into that question. Students will start with an oral history/interview of a person who can shed light on their question from a personal or professional perspective. They will then review the academic research literature on the question and research what the media says about the issue. Finally, students will write and present (to a non-academic audience) an informed argument of their own about how to address issues of power and inequality.

ENGL118501
Lit Core: The Danger of the Single Story: Reading Identity, Migration and Culture Graver, Elizabeth Fall 2021
We will read fiction and nonfiction by writers who have emigrated to the US as children or young adults, along with texts that explore the refugee experience and probe the relationship between language(s) and identity. We will encounter recurring themes around diaspora, exile, choice, national and transnational identities, as well as what Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie calls the danger of the single story. Students will perform literary analysis through informal and formal writing assignments, including frequent annotations and Canvas posts, close reading papers, a midterm, and a final exam.

Truth-telling in Literature Adair, Allison C Fall 2021
This course investigates how experience and imagination combine to produce compelling stories. We will question automatic distinctions between fact and fiction, examining written work instead on a spectrum of truth: from first-hand accounts and historical records to confessional poetry, historical fiction, and literary reportage, to parallel novels and even fantasy. Do literary techniques reveal or obscure truth? Can the imagination ever produce truth? We will consider the challenges of reliable and unreliable narration, cross-cultural translation, and embedded commentary in experimental poetry and metfiction. Authors include Tim O'Brien, Amitav Ghosh, Theresa Hak Kyung Cha, Plato, Emily Dickinson, Italo Calvino, and others.

Reading the Fate of Man, the Face of God, and the Malevolence of the Whale in Herman Melville's Moby Dick Martin, Michael Fall 2021
Core Renewal Course: Enduring Questions Moby Dick (1851), arguably the greatest American novel, raises questions fundamental to human existence: What is fate? freedom? the meaning of life? the world? Can we know it? This course examines how characters, narrative voice, genre, and plotting create an almost biblical text; how depictions of whaling become parables; how historical references reflect contemporary politics; and how fiction can bring us to reflect on our own lives. Like Queequegs tattoos, it presents a mystical treatise on the art of attaining truth . . . whose mysteries not even [he] himself could read while its value resides in simply raising the questions.

The Value of Work: Significance through Literature Hunt, Aeron P

Fall 2021

This is an Enduring Questions course and is open to FRESHMEN only. You must take PHIL1721 with this course. "What role and significance does work have in flourishing lives and good societies?" This course pair offers Boston College students the opportunity to reflect on the significance and meaning of the human activity of work an activity that is likely to occupy a large portion of their lives. Around the globe, politicians promise "good jobs," and scholars discuss automation and "the future of work." But what is a good job? What form of value is most central to work as a part of a good life financial reward? social purpose? personal fulfillment? How do individuals and communities understand and achieve justice and meaning at work?

The Role of Literature in Understanding the Complex Meaning of Justice De Rosa, Marla C

Fall 2021

This is an Enduring Questions course and is open to FRESHMEN only. You must take UNAS1719 with this course. What can literature tell us about the complex interactions between individuals and the law? What are the links between values, ethics, religious beliefs, and the law. How do various authors grapple with the complex interplay of these elements? In what ways can literary texts serve as an argument for justice or a polemic against injustice? In this course we will read a range of fiction and nonfiction narratives that examine the meanings of justice and the role of individuals within a legal system. We will work to understand why societies enact laws and whose interests those laws serve. We will also examine the role of lawyers, judges, and litigants and the complex dilemmas they face in both upholding laws and pursuing justice. In the context of the United States, we will specifically examine texts that address the intersection of race, justice, and the legal system. Major Course texts include Beloved (Toni Morrison), The Nickel Boys (Colson Whitehead), The Merchant of Venice (Shakespeare), To Kill a Mockingbird (Harper Lee), A Civil Action (Jonathan Harr), Just Mercy (Bryan Stevenson). Students will further develop their close reading and analysis skills, but also understand that literature is tied to and influenced by the historical and social contexts in which it is both created and read. This broader understanding of literature will encourage students to consider the cultural work that literary texts can do in the pursuit of justice. Microbes and Us: Exploring Nature and the Human in the Environmental Humanities Wallace, Elizabeth

Fall 2021

This is an Enduring Questions course and is open to FRESHMEN only. You must take BIOL1710 with this course. How do scientific understandings of basic life forms enlighten our understanding of the human? How do humanistic understandings shape our comprehension of the natural world? This course explores these questions by drawing parallels between the human behaviors and those of the minutest of living forms—microbes. Pairing microbiology with literary, philosophical, and critical readings allows humanistic and scientific disciplines to converge: what does each mean by life? What does it mean to be social? How are humans both alike and different from other creatures? We will ask how other life forms explain our existence and how an expanded scientific understanding results in new definitions of the human.

Crisis and Storytelling in the Age of Climate Change Palevsky, Hilary I; Song, Min
Fall 2021
This is a Complex problems course and is open to Freshman only. The realities of a changing climate, including intensified extreme weather events, rising sea levels, and strengthening heat waves and droughts, are already being felt by frontline communities around the world. This course focuses both on hearing stories about climate change as told by climate writers, scientists, and members of frontline communities, and telling these stories ourselves. We will examine storytelling as it works across mediums and genres from literature to scientific data visualizations, and consider what it means to write an essay, produce a graph, create a podcast, or make a film. Students in the course will read, watch, and analyze examples of climate storytelling, broadly defined, and produce their own personal essays, infographics, podcasts, and/or films. Some questions well foreground throughout the semester are: How do we communicate the science and the human impacts of the climate crisis? Whose ways of knowing and lived experiences do we privilege? How can the stories we tell move society towards just climate solutions?

American Literary History I Pottroff, Christy L Fall 2021
Students need not take these courses in chronological order. Fulfills the pre-1900 requirement. American Literary History 1 follows the development of American literary history from the landing of the Mayflower to the tumultuous decade of the 1850s, moving from such early writers as Bradstreet, Bowdoin and Taylor through such writers of the Revolution and Early Republic as Equiano, Franklin, and Rowson to such antebellum writers as Child, Thoreau, Hawthorne, Poe, Douglass, Whitman, and Melville. Course assignments include regular participation in class discussions, mid-semester and final examinations, and either one ten-page or two five-page essay(s). Students considering careers in secondary English education will be given the option of writing approaches to teaching course texts.

ENGL217001
Introduction to British Literature and Culture I Weiskott, Eric B Fall 2021
Fulfills the pre-1700 requirement. Britain, Ireland, and their archipelago were home to an exceptionally vibrant early literary tradition spanning English, French, Irish, Latin, Norse, and other languages. Writing from these islands connected rulers and rebels, merchants and monks, brewers and bureaucrats. This course is a survey of British literature (well question the term) from the beginnings to 1700. Most texts are in English; some are read in translation. The course focuses on connections between literature, power, and the formation of literary canons. The survey covers all major genres of early literature from the archipelago. Texts and authors include Beowulf, Marie de France, Chaucer, Margery Kempe, Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton, and Behn.

Formerly Titled: The City in Literature and Film. We examine how American literature and film have responded to the challenge of representing the city from Sister Carrie to Blade Runner, The Street to Do the Right Thing, and Native Speaker to Gangs of New York. Exploring the fit between the hard facts of city life and the creative choices that artists impose on them, we consider how novels and movies reckon with the formal, social, and conceptual problems posed by cities. We touch upon several cities and various genres: migration narratives, crime stories, science fiction, neighborhood novels, and more.

Note to Journalism minors: this course satisfies the requirement for an elective with a "critical" orientation. Note to all students: This course is included in CORE - Engaging Differences and Justice. The underground press was a vast network of loosely affiliated newspapers that emerged in the 1950s and 60s when young people asked very hard questions about the meaning of power and the role of the press. The outsider outlets spread through hundreds of communities throughout the nation, ranging from big city weeklies like "The Village Voice" and the Berkeley "Barb" to specialized periodicals representing the Black press, as well as other ethnic newspapers, progressive weeklies, and various conservative perspectives. Classical Mythology, Eisenfeld, Hanne E
This course explores the mythology of ancient Greece, Rome, and the Near East within its cultural, political, historical, and religious contexts. You will meet (or renew your acquaintance with) mythical figures like Zeus, Gilgamesh, Medusa, and Helen as they appear in multiple literary genres and other artistic media. In order to analyze and interrogate these myths we will use ancient and modern frameworks for thinking about what mythology is and what it does.

What can a myth tell us about the civilization that created, adopted, or adapted it? What do our uses of Classical mythology—and our creations of our own myths—tell us about ourselves?

ENGL222701
Introduction to Medical Humanities, Dunsford, Clare M
Fall 2021
This course offers an introduction to the interdisciplinary study of American culture. It is not a survey of American cultural history; rather, we will concentrate on approaches, methods, and themes of interest as we assemble critical skills for making interpretive arguments about aspects of culture in their historical moment. The forms we analyze will include examples from literature, film, painting, music, theater, landscape, and architecture, among others. Members of the American Studies faculty will present guest lectures to highlight various aspects of the field.

Black and Popular: Speculative Fictions by Black Writers Frederick, Rhonda
Fall 2021
This course asks: what do discussions of contemporary social issues look like when depicted in popular literatures written by writers of African descent? What is the benefit of fictionalizing these issues in genre literatures? Students address these questions by examining the forms of "speculative fictions" (specifically thriller, science fiction/fantasy, and mystery/detective) as well as urban romance to determine how each represents concerns of twentieth-twenty-first century black peoples in the U.S., Canada, Jamaica, and Martinique. Our focus on these genres' explorations of race, class, culture, incest, social engineering, and intimate relationships is complemented by socio-historical studies of these issues and countries.

ENGL248201
Introduction to African American Literature, Curseen, Allison S
Fall 2021
This course surveys African American literature from its early-American beginnings to its present. While different semesters may organize around different motifs, the course endeavors to introduce students to major periods (e.g., The Harlem Renaissance); key players (e.g., W.E.B. DuBois); and recurring tropes (e.g., the trickster) conventions (e.g., call-and-response), and themes (e.g., movement-and-constraint) in Black literature. Examining both a range of literary genres and a range of artistic, political, and popular texts, the course... emphasizes African American literature as interdisciplinary and inseparable from the history and culture of both a dynamic black diaspora and a diverse and complicated America.

Walking Infinite Jest Boucher, Christopher G Fall 2021
David Foster Wallace describes Enfield, Massachusetts—an important setting in his 1996 novel Infinite Jest—as “a kind of arm-shape extending north from Commonwealth Avenue and separating Brighton into Upper and Lower, its elbow nudging East Newton’s ribs and its fist sunk into Allston?”. Sound familiar? In this course, we’ll conduct a Bostonian’s reading of Wallace’s opus. Students will be required to write weekly critical reading responses, and should be prepared for the course’s non-traditional structure: weekly meetings will sometimes be canceled in lieu of weekend on-site meetings in Brighton and Boston.

The Art of Tutoring Writing Anderson, Lynne C Fall 2021 TBD
In this one-credit seminar we will read five novels by twentieth and twenty-first century women writers that suggest the mystery genre has much to offer in the way of literary analysis and enjoyment. Authors will include: Dorothy L. Sayers, Ngaio Marsh, Barbara Neely, Maj Sjowall, and Louise Penny. We will consider violence as a literary theme, gender norms in the genre (and their subversions), geography and journey as a central aspect of the works, as well as the allusive elements of myth and legend undergirding their structure.

ENGL311901
The Graphic Novel and Marginality Puente, Lorenzo A Fall 2021
This course will give students the critical skills to read, understand graphic narratives: the dynamic interrelationship between images and text to convey meaning. In particular, this course will study how writers/artists such as Art Spiegelman, Marjane Satrapi, Alison Bechdel, Gene Lueng Yang, Thi Bui, and Joe Sacco, among others, use the medium of comics to engage readers in exploring and analyzing issues of difference and justice. How do graphic artists represent issues of race and ethnicity, especially among minority communities that struggle against a long history of racist representation in the US media? How do graphic artists depict issues related to gender, sexual orientation, social class, religion, etc. This course will highlight how artists use graphic narratives to call attention to cases of humanitarian crises in the US and in different parts of the world. The medium of comics, considered marginal, lends itself to advocacy of issues of marginalized groups in society. The medium also creates space for encouraging artists as well as audiences to think otherwise, to imagine alternative social possibilities. This course fulfills the Cultural Core Diversity Requirement (Engaging Difference and Justice).

ENGL319001
Memory and Testimony in Irish Theatre DEPT Fall 2021
Do you have a family story about the past? Do you know of a story that isn’t told? Do you know of people who want to tell their story but have no one to listen? This course focuses on Irish plays as a way of exploring the questions of who gets to speak, what stories get told, and what stories do not get heard. In Irish theatre we encounter zany characters who can’t stop talking about a romanticized past, lonely voices speaking of deeply personal pain, and families who celebrate and inherit the memories of others. The plays in this course range from the comic to the tragic, and from fiction to documentary work. They ask challenging questions of how culture allows certain people to speak, and of how we can use our voices to tell our own stories. Each week students will read a new play and consider it in its cultural and critical context. There will be opportunities for writing creative as well as critical responses. Most of all, this aims to be a lively class where we all get to consider what it means to remember, what it means to forget, how we can be better listeners, and how we can find our own ways to give testimony. Playwrights may include: Samuel Beckett, Brian Friel, Tom Murphy, Mary Raftery, Marina Carr, Christina Reid, Enda Walsh, Sebastian Barry, Louise Lowé, Grace Dyas. Emilie Pine is Professor of Modern Drama in the School of English, Drama and Film at University College Dublin, Ireland. She is Editor of the Irish University Review and lead investigator on the Industrial Memories project (https://industrialmemories.ucd.ie). Emilie has published widely as an academic and critic, most recently The Memory Marketplace: Witnessing Pain in Contemporary Theatre (Indiana University Press, 2020), and the multi-award-winning Notes to Self: Essays, which has been translated into fifteen languages. Her first play will premiere in 2021.

Rags and Riches: Poverty and Wealth in Eighteenth-Century England Wallace, Elizabeth Fall 2021
Fulfills the pre-1900 requirement. This course examines the representation of poverty and wealth in eighteenth-century England. Using poetry, prose, drama, fiction, and visual arts as our texts, we will ask how the century generated stories and theories to account for economic disparities in society. Among other questions, we will ask how the period understood such phenomena as upward and downward mobility. How did emerging economic theory alter existing attitudes about social relations? What can these eighteenth-century texts tell us about our own attitudes towards poverty and wealth? Authors include: Defoe, Swift, Pope, Gay, Equiano, Blake, and Adam Smith.

General Linguistics Owusu, Augustina Fall 2021
An introduction to linguistics the scientific study of human language and contemporary linguistic theory. Linguists use mathematical systems (often called formal systems) to develop precise theories that help us understand the rich cognitive processes that support our use of language to communicate, to conduct internal monologues, and much more. The course focuses on the major subfields within linguistics: phonetics, phonology, morphology, syntax, and semantics: how do linguists create and manipulate representations of language phenomena, and how do they analyze linguistic data? Our primary data will be from English, but we will also employ data from other languages. No previous exposure to the field is presupposed.

Transatlantic Passages in Eighteenth-Century Literature Milstein, Rebekah K Fall 2021
In 1776, a cartoon was published in England that personifies Britain and America as female combatants, slinging insults at one another as they face off in a fistfight. But their literary relationship was not always so adversarial, even after they parted ways following the American Revolution. In this class, we will examine the ways different kinds of Atlantic crossings shaped Anglophone texts on both sides of the ocean. The reading list may include fiction by Samuel Richardson, Penelope Aubin, and Royall Tyler, life writing by Mary Rowlandson and Mary Prince, and poetry by Phyllis Wheatley and James Granger. Eco-Fictions: World Economy and the Meaning of Nature Shin, Jee K Fall 2021
The calls for climate justice and environmental ethics, though motivated by climate science, emerge largely from our everyday experiences with our environment. Here imaginative works of fiction and non-fiction, poetry, art, and cultural history provide inspiration. By focusing on the environment as a global (not merely an American) issue we shall study classic and contemporary works from around the world that raise awareness about the significance of human action upon the planet. The course will include a variety of genres and media such as film, art, theory, fiction, poetry, and creative non-fiction.

Kafka, Beckett, Coetzee Lehman, Robert S
Fall 2021
This course will be dedicated to a reading of the works of three of the century's strangest writers: Franz Kafka (1883-1924), Samuel Beckett (1906-1989), and J.M. Coetzee (b. 1940). Although our principal focus will be on their novels, we'll also consider their work in a variety of other genres—parables (Kafka), film and theater (Beckett), and philosophy (Coetzee). We'll take up the question of how these writers responded to a rapidly modernizing world—a world characterized by war, revolution, new technologies, and a globalizing economy—as well as how they came to understand literature's past, present, and future.

Sexuality and Film: Queer Theory / Queer Cinema Ohi, Kevin J
Fall 2021
Queer readings of cinema make especially clear queer theory's departure from enterprises that made it possible: from feminism, psychoanalysis, gay studies, and the search for "positive" representations, for example. Offering an introduction to queer theory, this course will also ask broader questions about sexuality and film. How does queer theory influence one's thinking about spectatorship? Why do we find films sexy even when, in a sterner mood, we might nevertheless find them politically objectionable? What if we look at films not as "examples" to be glossed but as modes of thought that pursue questions of sexuality in their own terms? This course meets the Cultural Diversity Requirement.

Topics in Creative Nonfiction: Writing and Activism: Good Trouble Garcia, Kimberly
Fall 2021
Ordinary people with extraordinary vision can redeem the soul of America by getting in what I call good trouble, as said Congressman John Lewis. This advanced creative nonfiction course will encourage students to observe, engage with, and write about the good trouble being enacted in our historical moment that excites them. From the NBA to backyard permeaculture or public protests, students will explore the good trouble they have experienced or admired, using the many tools creative nonfiction allows memoir, blog, flash journalism, and lyrical essay. Through careful observation and documentation of the hidden connections between the personal and public moment, students will be encouraged to actively participate in imagining what a better world might look like and inspiring good trouble in their readers. Text include: March, graphic memoir by John Lewis; The Book of Delights by Ross Gay; Best American Essays 2020 edited by Rebecca Solnit; Tell It Slant by Miller/Paolo.

Digital Literature Boucher, Christopher G Fall 2021
Technology is changing the way we read and write literature. Browse the iOS or Android app store and you'll see that countless writers and artists are now using digital-specific tools—from hyperlinks to geolocation to augmented reality—to create cutting-edge electronic literature. This course will invite you to study the genre both critically and creatively; we'll review creative writing fundamentals, elements of new media, hypertext theory, and basic programming skills. Then we'll synthesize all of this in order to write and code our own original digital projects. No prior experience in creative writing or computer programming is required for this course—just a willingness to learn about both disciplines and the ways in which they intersect.

Seminar: Podcasting James Joyce Nugent, Joseph G Fall 2021
One astonishing book, one unforgettable experience, one seminar a week. Interminently baffling, always fascinating, frequently hilarious, Joyce presents a challenge that no serious devotee of literature (not just English majors) should refuse. Along our intimate journey through the greatest novel of the Modernist movement, we will employ a few modern digital tools to help ask great humanistic questions. Eagerness, curiosity, and a sense of humor are the only prerequisites. The demand that I make of my reader, Joyce wrote, is that he should devote his whole life to reading my works. Don't wait. In other words, we will identify and explore thematic and artistic concerns that arise in Morrison's work and that dialogue with United States' historical realities. The following themes shape this course: dominant cultural mores and their impact (The Bluest Eye); legacies of slavery (Beloved); gender, race, and Americanism (A Mercy); culture as a sustaining force, masculinity (Song of Solomon); women's responses to patriarchial and constructions of feminalmess (Sula); and race, belonging, citizenship (Home).

Seminar: American Fiction and the Family Tanner, Laura E Fall 2021
This experimental seminar will explore the representation of family dynamics and everyday life in American literature of the last century. We will consider how the dynamics of race, class, aging, grief, gender, violence, power, consumerism, desire and domestic space shape the construction of individual and family identities in American fiction, film, and graphic narratives. This class will focus on nontraditional and collaborative alternatives to the research-based seminar model, including discussion partners, class presentations on non-literary media, creative non-fiction writing, interview exercises, and optional video and music projects, as well as co-authoring of more traditional critical essays. Texts may include novels by William Faulkner, Marilynne Robinson, Don DeLillo, Louise Erdrich and Sherman Alexie. As we analyze literary and artistic strategies for representing the complex and subtle emotional dynamics of relationships that often define family life, students will also be asked to reflect critically and creatively on their own assumptions. Participants will be required to engage in dialogue with others, listen carefully, question their own upbringing and experiences, and experiment with new forms of expression and collaboration; students who are willing to think outside the box are especially welcome!

Seminar: Building a Better Bestiary: Representing Medieval Animals Stanton, Robert G Fall 2021
Fullfills the pre-1700 requirement and Seminar Requirement. This course explores the troubled boundaries between human and non-human subjects and objects in the Middle Ages. Animals provided rich symbolism for human virtues, vices, and activities, often at the cost of any subjective voice, but categories distinguishing humans from animals frequently blurred or broke down, creating both crises of human identity and anomalous animal voices; we will be on the lookout for animals who talk or bite back. We will read a variety of medieval genres alongside works in the emerging field of Critical Animal Studies to explore the ways in which humans and animals create one another. Our methods will incorporate philosophy, mythology, animal rights and ethics, and visual art with literary and historical texts from the Middle Ages.

Seminar: Shakespeare: Truth and Lies Crane, Mary T Fall 2021
Fullfills the pre-1700 requirement for undergrads. Also fulfills the Seminar requirement. Undergrad/Grad Level: Restricted to Juniors, Seniors, and Graduate Students. Shakespeare lived and wrote at a time when the ideas about what was true, and how to determine what was true, were changing. The Protestant reformation, invention of the printing press, humanist education, exploration and colonialism, and the beginnings of the scientific revolution all motivated people to focus on questions of truth, falsehood, and epistemology. Although newspapers were just beginning to be invented near the end of Shakespeare’s life, his plays are obsessed with fake news, how to tell if people are lying, how to figure out what is true. In this class we will read a selection of Shakespeare’s comedies, histories, tragedies, and romances with a focus on how truth and lies are represented. We will also consider the history of various conspiracy theories that have tried to establish that William Shakespeare did not write the plays attributed to him.

ENGL601301
Seminar: Dickens and his World McAleavey, Maia M Fall 2021
Pre-1900 for undergraduates. Undergrad/Grad Level: Restricted to Juniors, Seniors, and Graduate Students. Charles Dickens was one of the most beloved authors of the Victorian period, and his novels can still make us laugh and cry. This course provides an opportunity to survey Dickens's astonishing career: raging against social injustice, wallowing in sentimental deathbed scenes, and cackling at ridiculous caricatures. Novels will include Oliver Twist, David Copperfield, Bleak House, and Little Dorrit. Topics will include: the power and danger of sentimentality and melodrama; characterization and narrative structure; satire and comedy; journalism and fiction; and Dickens's pioneering development of serialized novels, which laid the groundwork for today's serial television.

ENGL603001
Seminar: Digital Donne DEPT Fall 2021
In this course we will read selections from the writings of John Donne and his circle, drawing on the close (and ourselves contributing to) the extensive digital resources available for exploring them. Paradoxically, while Donne left behind a large prose corpus, he shied away from printing his poems. Because those who read his hand written productions made myriad copies for themselves, we have more, and more varied, surviving manuscript versions of Donne’s poems, scholars and their students have made it possible to access, search, and probe these materials in unprecedented ways. We will concentrate on the poems erotic, satirical, and religious verses. Well also look into the meditations, written amidst an epidemic, in which he declared that no man is an island and sought to explore its implications. The course satisfies the "discipline" specific requirement for the Graduate Certificate in Digital Humanities.

ENGL603101
Seminar: Theories of Blackness: Troubling Vision Curseen, Allison S Fall 2021
Organized around Nicole Fleetwood's monograph titled Troubling Vision, this course will think about the convergence of vision and performance in black artistic and intellectual production. The course will approach canonical black texts like The Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl, or The Souls of Black Folk with contemporary scholars explicit theorization about blackness and black bodies in performance. Possible scholars/theorists explored include Daphne Brook, E. Patrick Johnson, Freddi Daniel Goldman; Andrew LePecky, Maurice Wallace, Robin Bernstein, and Erica Edwards. Possible authors/artists examined may include: Harriet Jacobs, W. E. B. DuBois, Ida Forsyth, Bert
Joyce's Ulysses Howes, Marjorie E Fall 2021
This course will be dedicated to an extended exploration of James Joyce's Ulysses, a novel that has often been called the most important literary work of the twentieth century. Most of our time will be devoted to an intensive reading of the novel itself, but we will also read selected critical and historical materials. No prior knowledge of Joyce's works is required, just a willingness to tackle the challenges offered by his most influential masterpiece.

ENGL888701
Introduction to Advanced Research Stanton, Robert G Fall 2021
This course will acquaint you with the resources to carry out the central tasks of literary scholarship. Bibliography (studying the production, dissemination, collection, location, and identification of literary artifacts and versions) forms the dynamic basis for scholarship and criticism of all kinds, just as critical sensibility guides our choice of what to look for. You will be guided through the reference works and databases in the Boston College library and elsewhere, discuss the goals, purposes, and future of the field of literary studies, explore the phenomenon of digital humanities, and produce an original project based on archival sources.

Ph.D. Seminar: Queer Theory and the Novel Ohi, Kevin J Fall 2021
In what ways might queer theory illuminate the history of the novel, and how might a consideration of the novel as a genre shape our sense of the theoretical concerns of queer theory? Queer theory can be, curiously, both sexualizing and desexualizing: removing one's alibis for suppressing evidence of non-normative desire, it also makes us pay attention to sex by showing us that it is not merely sex, by reminding us that, for human beings, the experience of desire is saturated by forms of human meaning. How texts represent sex is a far from trivial question; it is also not the only question one can ask about sex in literary works. Focused on sex in the novel, and informed by queer theory, the course will lead us to consider a series of questions about the novel genre: formal questions, primarily, of style and voice, of characterization, narration, and the representation of interiority, these are also questions, we will come to see, of the history of desire, and of how intimate lives are shaped by larger social forces. Along the way, we will also ask ourselves about the particularly literary dimensions of queer theory as it has developed between the 1990s and today. Ultimately, it is to be hoped that the course will help us reflect on what we do as critics, no matter what our particular specialties or investments: the starkly framed question of sex in the novel might allow us to read novels and theory without reducing literary texts to inert examples of theoretical insights, or particular theories to a mere interchangeable methods for reading texts. Discussions will focus on detailed readings of novels written in English between 1715 and 2019, and of works of queer theory.

Literature Core for English Language Learners Labriola, Amanda
Spring 2022
Designed as a seminar for English Language Learners, students explore the principal motives which prompt people to read literature: to assemble and assess the shape and values of one's own culture, to discover alternative ways of looking at the world, to gain insight into issues of permanent human importance as well as contemporary urgency, and to enjoy the linguistic and formal satisfactions of literary art. Literature Core strives to develop the student's capacity to read and write with clarity and engagement and to provide an introduction to literary genres. Linguistic support for students from diverse language backgrounds is provided throughout the semester. Department Permission Required--from the English Department.

Literature Core Nugent, Joseph G

Spring 2022
In Literature Core, students explore the principal motives which prompt people to read literature: to assemble and assess the shape and values of one’s own culture, to discover alternative ways of looking at the world, to gain insight into issues of permanent human importance as well as issues of contemporary urgency, and to enjoy the linguistic and formal satisfactions of literary art. Literature Core will strive to develop the student’s capacity to read and write with clarity and engagement, to allow for that dialogue between the past and present we call history, and to provide an introduction to literary genres. For course descriptions of the individual sections please see: www.bc.edu/literaturecore

ENGL109401
An Introduction to Modern Irish II Cahill, Sean R
Spring 2022
Following on from ENGL1093, this course offers a continuing introduction to the Irish language for American students. This semester we will learn the past, future and imperative tenses. We will examine the history of English and British policy toward the language, up to the controversy over the Irish Language Act today. We will continue to learn songs, and examine simple poetry and drama in Irish. Through this exploration you will enlarge your understanding of the cultural heritage out of which the language emerged, and which is accessible through Irish Gaelic.
Completion of this and Continuing Modern Irish I and II will fulfill the Morrissey College of Arts and Sciences language proficiency requirement.

ENGL118001
Lit Core: Narratives of Slavery, Incarceration, and Freedom De Rosa, Marla C
Spring 2022
This section of Literature Core will focus on narratives that speak to questions of slavery, incarceration, and freedom--both literal and metaphorical. The current pandemic along with the mass demonstrations against systemic racial injustices will provide a particular backdrop and context from which to consider these questions and issues. The course will start with historical and political writings about slavery from the 1800s and the social contexts in which these writings were produced and consumed. We will then move on to historical and contemporary fiction and film that informs and challenges our historical understanding of slavery and the relationship between slavery and our current system of incarceration. Course texts may include Homegoing (Yaa Gyasi), The Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, David Walker's Appeal, Beloved (Toni Morrison), Kindred (Octavia Butler), The Nickel Boys (Colson Whitehead), and Just Mercy (Bryan Stevenson).

Room and Schedule: Stokes Hall 403N TuTh 10:30AM-11:45AM Satisfies Core Requirement: Literature, Cultural Diversity Prerequisites: None
This section of Literature Core will explore how literary texts bear witness to historical events and address social issues. Through the study of poetry, fiction, drama, and autobiography, we will examine how writers have used a variety of literary genres and forms to transform traumatic memories and the experiences of displacement and oppression into art. Topics include slavery and the Holocaust. Texts may include Herman Melville's Benito Cereno, Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, Toni Morrison's Beloved, Art Spiegelman's Maus, Tommy Orange's There There, and The Laramie Project.

This course focuses on American literature about work, especially blue-collar work, service work, and women's work. In reading working lives, we will also be reading national narratives about class, gender, race, and immigration. In diverse texts ranging from Walt Whitman to Gish Jen, we will ask: how are power and privilege represented in this literature? What are the underlying assumptions? How have contemporary class divides taken root from our history? By looking at style, voice, figurative language, and structure, we will discover how writers strategically shape meaning across genres.

Family Matters: Stories of Adoption and Kinship Smith, James M Spring 2022
Core Renewal Course: Enduring Questions What makes a family? Why does kinship matter? How can reading stories of adoption inform our response to such questions? In this course students will examine adoption as narrative event (exploring its relationship to the bildungsroman, the rags-to-riches story, memoir), as image (the orphan, the abandoned waif, the unmarried mother), and as metaphor (of dependence and independence, of separation and affiliation, of origins and fresh starts). And because adoption foregrounds fundamental issues of identity (constructed and inherited), we will investigate the role(s) of nation, empire, and religion in regulating childhood and family life.

Revolutionary Media: How Reading Changes Us Crane, Mary T Spring 2022
Core Renewal Course: Enduring Questions As digital media have become more prevalent, studies have shown that they have changed the way we read and that various modes of reading shape our thinking, our feelings, and even our brains in varying ways. We read textbooks differently than we read poems, tweets differently than we read novels. This course centers on the cognitive and social contexts of reading, and will read a range of texts in different media, from 1450 to the present, that deal in some way with the nature of reading itself, including pamphlets, poems, novels, a graphic novel, film, and social media. We will also work on developing strategies for effective reading and writing.

Narrative and Myth in American Culture: The Case of Disney Rudner, Bonnie Spring 2022
Core Renewal: Enduring Questions For Freshmen Only Storytelling and narrative have been central elements of communication since humans began to live in social structures. For hundreds of years, folk tales were adapted in order to influence social beliefs, values, attitudes, and behaviors. This literature core course will explore the history of folk tales and their movement around the world. After reading source material from Grimm, Perrault, Anderson, and others, we will focus on the ways tales have been altered by the Disney Corporation in order to assess the impact of the movies on audiences.

Shifting Forms: Sexuality and Belonging in Modern Literature and Film Ohi, Kevin J Spring 2022
How does art shape or mediate the formation of (larger and smaller, mainstream and minority) political and social groups? How do the arts help define the public in a Republic? How do aesthetic objects shape minority communities, and their place in a larger social world? Can examining artists use of inherited forms illuminate the political and affective consequences of individuals banding into groups? Tracing representations of citizenship, political participation, and the nation-state since the late 19th century, and, on the other hand, queer film and literature (mainstream and avant-garde) from the same period, we will consider national narratives and national identity in Europe and the United States, and queer art and the formation of minority sexual cultures.

Boundaries of Belonging: Race and Anti-Essentialist Art Brooks, John A Spring 2022
We have control over our identities or do we? We assume that identity means our sense of self, or that it reflects who we are because of our personality and experiences. This description indicates that we have control over our identities but do we? Identity is not just individual, it is also collective because it denotes social markers like race, gender, sexuality, language, and religion. Focusing on race, these paired courses explore the ambiguities and tensions between individual and collective identities, as well as how racial identity formation in the U.S. is mediated by outside forces. Key topics will include how space and place mediate racial identity, but also how racial discourse recycles racist ideas to predetermine how racial groups can be seen, known, and imagined. By surveying literature, film, and music while interrogating concepts like mobility/containment, inclusion/exclusion, and belonging/alienation, we will see how people have created and contested the boundaries of racial and spatial divisions across the U.S.

Studies in Narrative Lehman, Robert S Spring 2022
This course introduces students to questions that they might bring to the study of narrative works—primarily novels, tales, and non-fictional narratives, though it may also include drama, film, and narrative poems. It aims to introduce the various critical frames through which we construct interpretations. As part of the process of reading, students will be introduced to common critical terms; narrative genres, conventions, and discourses; the construction of the character and the ways of representing consciousness; and the ordering of narrative time. The course will also expose the student to the implications of taking critical positions.

ENGL214301
American Literary History III Tanner, Laura E
Spring 2022
This course provides an introductory overview of literature written in the United States from World War I to the early twenty-first century. We will look at the ways writers of this period have experimented idiosyncratically and in dialogue with one another as modernism turned postmodern, as cansons collold and collapsed, as movies and music albums, as well as graphic literature displaced some of literature's more traditional forms. The course is largely conversational but structurally supported with student oral presentations. Required texts may include fiction by William Faulkner, Willa Cather, Toni Morrison, Maxine Hong Kingston, Sherman Alexie, and Junot Diaz, plus graphic literature by Art Spiegelman and Thi Bui. Requirements for the course include an oral presentation, two critical essays, two section exams, and a final exam.

Introduction to British Literature and Culture II
Seshadri, Kalpana R
Spring 2022

Drills the pre-1900 requirement. This lecture course explores great British writers from 1700 to the present. This period includes (among much else) the great essayists and satirists of the eighteenth century, the Romantic poets and Victorian novelists of the nineteenth, the modernists of the twentieth, and the world writing that follows the break-up of the British empire. We consider these works in light of the cultural context in which they were written.

ENGL219901
Introduction to Caribbean Writers Frederick, Rhonda
Spring 2022

The Caribbean, merely viewed through the lens of colonial history, often does not reflect the diversity and complexity of the region. From a colonial perspective, therefore, the Caribbean is both "known" and "unknown." Our work for this course compares and contrasts versions of the region by examining colonial histories and current literary traditions. We will pay particular attention to the ways oppositional cultures and identities manifest in Caribbean literature. Themes of this course include: colonialism, History/histories, gender, geography, aton, sexuality, class, and culture. Varied texts and media will assist in our interpretations of the Caribbean and its diaspora.

ENGL222201
Introduction to Creative Writing for Multilingual Students Anderson, Lynne C
Spring 2022

Are you a speaker of another language (or languages) in addition to English? Have you always wanted to write creatively but never had the time? In this beginning-level creative writing workshop, participants will embark on their own personal, artistic journeys and gain confidence as writers of English. You will consider the languages, family rituals, and stories that have shaped you by writing deeply personal essays and spoken-word poems that explore your identity as a writer and storyteller. You will write weekly, both in and out of class, and learn to listen carefully to your peers and the stories they have to share. We will discuss your classmates drafts throughout the semester and you will learn to provide thoughtful feedback to help one another build confidence and find joy in writing. In addition to reading the work of students in our workshop, we will read texts by multicultural storytellers including Sandra Cisneros, Jhumpa Lahiri, and Chang Rae Lee and explore the ways in which cultural and social identities shape identity. We will encourage one another to write boldly and freely and be creative with form, looking to spoken word poets, such as G Yamazawa who writes from the lens of the cultural outsider, for inspiration. Well experiment with language mixing, code-switching, play with sentence structure, and learn to abandon the rules of English grammar in early drafts in order to free ourselves to explore our personal stories more deeply. All levels of writers are encouraged to register.

Studies in Children's Literature: Disney and the Wondertale Rudner, Bonnie
Spring 2022

Disney films have remained outside the critical landscape because they have been considered "known" and "unknown." Our work for this course compares and contrasts versions of the region by examining colonial histories and current literary traditions. We will pay particular attention to the ways oppositional cultures and identities manifest in Caribbean literature. Themes of this course include: colonialism, History/histories, gender, geography, aton, sexuality, class, and culture. Varied texts and media will assist in our interpretations of the Caribbean and its diaspora.

ENGL224101
Playwriting I Cummings, Scott T
Spring 2022

This writing-intensive course offers a practical introduction to the art and craft of writing for performance. Students will engage in numerous writing exercises that highlight the special demands and opportunities of writing for the stage. Emphasis is placed on finding ways to contact and release the theatrical imagination and on mastering the basics of writing a solid dramatic scene. Exemplary plays by established playwrights will be studied as appropriate, but the overwhelming emphasis is on student writing.

American Culture: Engaging Difference and Justice Harrison-Kahan, Lori
Spring 2022
This course offers an introduction to the interdisciplinary study of American culture with an emphasis on questions of difference, justice, and power. We will concentrate on approaches, methods, and themes of interest as we assemble critical tools for making interpretive arguments about aspects of culture in their historical moment. While assembling a toolkit of interpretive moves we can make on American culture and working to build stronger analyses, we will also consider how American society and culture have been defined by differences of race, class, gender, sexuality, disability, religion, and other socio-cultural categories. We will consider how American Studies scholars have combined theory and praxis in order to expose injustice in the nations past and present; form communities based on principles of inclusion and solidarity; and create just conditions for citizenship and humanity. The materials we analyze will include examples from film, television, music, literature, theater, comics, photography, advertising, among others. Each unit will be organized around a question that generates further questions, analysis, and discussion. The questions include, for instance, Why is Indigenous Studies central to American Studies?, What does visual culture tell us about race in modern America?, and How do we see race and religion after 9/11? During the semester, we will also attend a number of events sponsored by American Studies, AADS, and other interdisciplinary departments, centers, and programs that represent a variety of interests, subjects, and approaches. This course satifies the university Cultural Diversity requirement. Note for American Studies Minors: Students can take either ENGL2278 or ENGL 2277: Introduction to American Studies to satisfy the introductory course requirement. (Students cannot receive credit for both courses.)

Spring 2022
Disability and ability are socially constructed categories that provoke questions about how we as a society deal with difference. This course explores representations of disability in fiction, poetry, memoir, and essays. Questions of representation—who gets to tell the story, how disability has been represented historically at different times and in different cultures—will be considered with reference to the work of theorists like Rosemarie Garland Thomson and Tobin Siebers. Readings may include Sophocles' Philoctetes, Wordsworth's "The Idiot Boy," The Curious Incident of the Dog in the Night-time, and Michael Berube's Life as We Know It: A Father, A Family, and an Exceptional Child, among others.

The History and the Future of the Book Pottruff, Christy L
Spring 2022
A book may only be made of paper, cardboard, ink, and glue, but it is nonetheless a remarkable piece of technology. This class is concerned with the long history, the varied present, and the uncertain future of the book in the digital age. We will explore three central questions: What is the history of the book as a physical and cultural object? How have current disruptions in reading and writing technology changed the way we use and imagine books? What does the future of the book look like?

The Victorian Coming-of-Age Novel Dougherty, Daniel
Spring 2022
The coming-of-age story has existed for centuries and is still one of the most popular narratives in books and films. In this course we will read a selection of some of the best known and enduring novels in the genre, particularly those that depict the rapidly changing and evolving Victorian world. Recurring course themes will include youth and maturity, self-discovery, family, friendship, and growth. We will think through questions that complicate genre as well as questions that seek to answer why the coming-of-age story has lasted in recognizable form for as long as it has. Potential authors include Charlotte Bronte, Charles Dickens, George Eliot, and Joseph Conrad. This course satisfies the pre-1900 requirement for English majors.

Ireland Says Yes: Queer Love in Irish Literature Lehre, Theodore S
Spring 2022
With the 2015 legalization of same-gender marriage in Ireland, there is more opportunity than ever to consider the LGBTQ+ community's indelible impact on Ireland's culture and, in this course especially, its literature. This course examines queer love and its manifestations in Irish literature, from childhood crushes to steamy passions to widowed grief. We will discuss this literature in its historical context and put it into conversation with international queer writers and thinkers. Through a period-spanning exploration of poetry and prose, we will consider how literature reflects queer people living and loving in Ireland. The course may include the works of Emma Donoghue, Colin Tolin, Jamie O'Neill, Mary Dorsey, and Kate O'Brien, as well as...
as the accounts and histories of historical Irish figures like Roger Casement and Eva Gore-Booth. This course satisfies the Literature Across Worlds requirement for English majors.

Americanization and the Rhetorics of Citizenship Portillo, Vincent Spring 2022
In this course, we will explore how race, ethnicity and social class influence thinking about normative ideals of citizenship. We will turn our attention toward underrepresented communities including migrants, racialized and gendered individuals and others labeled unfit that have navigated the needs of citizenship, while balancing heritage languages and identities as a foundation of community knowledge and values. Throughout the semester, we will work collaboratively, reading, researching and writing about evolving questions and concerns. At the start of the semester, we will engage shared readings, largely non-fiction, from across disciplines, including American Studies, Disability Studies, and Cultural Rhetorics. These readings will explore the ways in which the individual and national bodies are described rhetorically, with an emphasis on citizenship as a nativist cure for unfit individuals. Next, we will turn to the archives where we will engage a number of primary materials that explore the contribution of marginalized communities to conversations on citizenship with an emphasis on heritage language, as well as community knowledge and values. For a culminating research project, students may seek to intervene in ongoing conversations on citizenship, advocating for the ways in which citizenship may be enacted and embodied within a community of their choice. Potential topics, for example, may include representations of citizenship during BLM protests at public monuments, or voting rights, race and citizenship schools. This course satisfies the Literature Across Worlds requirement for English majors.

Faulkner to Beyonce: New South Aesthetics Ards, Angela Spring 2022
Faulkner to Beyonce: 2016 audiovisual project, Lemonade, conjures a black Southern experience from multiple places and modes—from memories and sounds of New Orleans pre- and post-Hurricane Katrina, to the ancestral wisdom of grandmothers passed down through the generations. The course explores how Lemonade flips familiar cultural markers of southern identity into a meditation and manifesto about what it means to be black and Southern now. We will ground our readings and discussions with question such as these: What type of South is Lemonade trying to get us to see and hear? What are the feminist frameworks, from Zora Neale Hurston’s Their Eyes Were Watching God to filmmaker Julie Dash’s Daughters of the Dust, that animate Lemonade’s vision? And what exactly does it mean to “get in formation?”

Unrequited Love Ohi, Kevin J Spring 2022
Fullfills the pre-1900 requirement. In unrequited love, one confronts, in a deprivation as primal, almost, as hunger, the limits of one’s power to shape the world, discovers the radically alien nature of others’ desires and minds. This course will explore the many complexities of that painful mismatch, and the ways its unresolved contradictions--one is at once singular and replaceable, for instance, trapped in a place at once fertile and contingent--leads one to large, intractable literary and aesthetic questions (character, psychology, social embeddedness, ethics). Readings will include texts from many countries and periods, fields, and genres: philosophy, psychoanalysis, novels, poems, opera, film, for example.

Science Writing Sutton, Sarah C Spring 2022
From driverless cars to gene therapy to cryptocurrency, the latest scientific and technological breakthroughs promise to transform life as we know it. When science moves from the lab to corporate boardrooms, to news headlines, and into our daily lives, writing is involved in every step along the way. In this course, we will read works created by and about scientists, and explore how science circulates through society via social media and blog posts, traditional media, and government policy making. We’ll also examine how companies communicate with the public via press releases, the media, and advertisements. In written and oral assignments, students will practice the skills essential for success in writing about science: - researching and reporting, interviewing scientists, pitching new ideas, understanding audience expectations, and clearly communicating essential knowledge. Students will have multiple opportunities to conceive, draft, revise, and complete writing projects tailored to diverse audiences. This course aims to help students understand and explore science writing as a career—including opportunities in media, research labs, university news offices, museums, science and technology focused companies, and many other venues.

Outcast Ireland: Paupers, Penitents, Patients Smith, James M Spring 2022
This course considers the roles played by institutions in Irish society since the formation of the State (1922). We study the history of institutional provision, both as a legacy of empire and an apparatus of social control throughout the twentieth century, e.g., Industrial Schools, Magdalene Laundries, Mother and Baby Homes, and “Mental Hospitals.” We examine the legislation and social policy informing social phenomena contained by these institutions, e.g., poverty, illegitimacy, single motherhood, deviancy, illness, etc. We analyze how literary and cultural representations (e.g., fiction, drama, poetry, film, memoir, journalism, and testimony) contribute to making visible aspects of Irish society typically hidden from view. And, we evaluate the significance of human rights advocacy campaigns, survivor organizations, and the State's response to demands for justice, redress, and memorialization.

ENGL490701
Irish Gothic Howes, Marjorie E Spring 2022
Ghosts and vampires, lunatics and criminals, human corruption and supernatural punishment: these things have fascinated generations of Irish writers and readers. This advanced seminar will investigate why Ireland produced such a rich tradition of Gothic literature, beginning in the early nineteenth century and continuing right up to the present. We will also explore various critical and theoretical approaches to the genre: political, historical, psychological, sexual, and religious. Writers to be studied include Maria Edgeworth, Sheridan LeFanu, Charles Maturin, Bram Stoker, Oscar Wilde, Elizabeth Bowen, and Patrick McCabe. ENGL491501
Advanced Fiction Writing Workshop Graver, Elizabeth Spring 2022
Admission to this course is by permission of the instructor. Graduate/Undergraduate Level. Restricted to Graduate Students, Seniors, Juniors and Sophomores. The Advanced Fiction Workshop provides encouragement, practice, and criticism for students who have demonstrated accomplishment in writing fiction. The workshop format demands self-motivation and universal participation. Since students stories are texts for class discussion, a generous willingness to respond to others writing and to expose one's own work to such reactions is an essential prerequisite. Individual conferences with the instructor supplement workshop discussions. Students are expected to produce a steady stream of new and revised fiction throughout the semester. Narrative preferences from the traditional to the experimental are welcome. Admission is by writing sample. If you are interested in an intensive writing process with like-minded peers, please apply! Students should send up to 8 double-spaced pages of creative writing to elizabeth.graver@bc.edu by 10/21. Your submission may be part of a larger piece; if so, indicate this on the manuscript, along with a paragraph explaining your interest in the course and a list of other college level writing workshops you have taken, with instructors and grades. Ideally, the writing sample will be fiction, but if your strongest writing is in creative non-fiction or poetry or drama, that is also acceptable, though prose is encouraged. Include your e-mail address. Late applications will be considered on a rolling basis as space in the class permits.

ENGL491701
Advanced Poetry Workshop Matson, Suzanne M Spring 2022
Admission to this course is by permission of the instructor. Graduate/Undergraduate Level. Restricted to Graduate Students, Seniors, Juniors and Sophomores. This is a workshop for those who already have some experience writing poetry, and who wish to continue to work on matters of craft and revision. Students will produce roughly two poems a week, responding to each other’s drafts in workshop discussion. Though the bulk of class discussion will be about student writing, some class time will be devoted to a discussion of useful models and what they can teach us about strategy and craft. Short in-class exercises will be given weekly as prompts to begin the writing process. In ongoing consultation with the instructor about which poets might interest them most, students will devise their own reading list of contemporary poets and keep a response journal. In at least two half-hour conferences over the semester, each student will be given individual feedback on revisions. The final project will be a chapbook of at least 12 revised poems produced over the semester, culled from around 25 drafts produced in and out of class. Admission is by writing sample. If you are interested in an intensive writing process with like-minded peers, please apply! For application to Advanced Poetry Workshop (ENGL491701), send 4 poems to Suzanne Matson (suzanne.matson@bc.edu) by 10/21. Late applications will be considered on a rolling basis as space in the class permits.

ENGL551301
American Studies Senior Seminar: Transnational American Studies Klein, Christina Spring 2022
This seminar offers a deep dive into the transnational wing of American Studies. Instead of taking Americas borders as the limit of inquiry, we will explore the cultural history of Americas relationship with the world beyond its borders specifically Asia from the 18th century to the present. Our focus will be on the relationship between the material conditions of American and Asian life (political, military, economic, social) and the production of diverse forms of culture (household goods, dance, movies, performance, propaganda, etc.). The seminar culminates in a substantial research paper about a cultural artifact of your choosing.

ENGL552201
Capstone: Creativity and Self Roberts, Susan A Spring 2022
Capstone classes are for seniors only and may NOT be taken Pass/Fail. You may take only ONE Capstone class before graduation. Creativity is the act of bringing that which does not exist into existence, of bringing forward that which has previously never lived. It is the remarkable experience of bringing something out of nothing. In order to bring something new into the world, you must be willing to go into the unknown. Just as the poet might listen inwardly and stay open for the next word and just as the artist might pay attention to the images that arise from within, creativity asks that we have one foot in what is known, or existence, and one foot in what is not-known, or non-existence. This requires an ability to be still, to look both inward and outward, and then to record the result in art-making or in life. In this Capstone course, students will attend to two areas: the meaning of art and mindfulness, and their own history of making (or lack thereof) and how they would like to build artistic sensibility, creativity and creation into their lives. We will investigate the spiritual roots of creativity, and the ways in which creativity and appreciation of art and art-making can contribute meaningfully to the development of one as a full citizen of the world. You do not have to have any experience in art-making to take this course. Texts include: Creativity: Where the Divine and Human Meet, by Matthew Fox and Art and Fear: Observations on the Perils (and Rewards) of Artmaking, by David Bayles and Ted Orland.

ENGL590201 Seminar: Global Victorians McAleavey, Maia M Spring 2022
This course will consider the literature of Victorian Britain from an international perspective. Questions of slavery, empire, commerce, subjugation, tourism, war, and settler colonialism will be central to our purpose. Key texts will include adventure stories, mystery and detective fiction, travel narratives, advertisements, speeches, and poetry. Combining close reading of canonical texts with attention to nineteenth-century writers of color as well as research in historical and visual archives, we will draw our own conclusions about the ways in which the global Victorians influences the world we confront today.

ENGL590101 Seminar: Text/Photograph: Readings for Writers Graver, Elizabeth Spring 2022
In this course, you will both study published texts and produce creative writing of your own. Texts will include works of fiction, creative nonfiction and poetry, along with theoretical writing about photography. Students will write frequent short reading responses and writing experiments. Two independent longer projects the first a craft analysis of a work that combines text and photo, the second a sustained piece of creative writing with photos will allow you to go into greater depth. Among the questions we will ask are: How do text and image work together to illustrate, unsettle, contradict or reach towards the unspeakable? How can they open up explorations of memory and postmodern identities? How do text/image pairings function in our current, over saturated time? We will attend photographer Martin Parr's 1/27 talk and view his photographs at the McMullen Museum. We will read Claudia Rankine's Citizen, An American Lyric and attend her 3/2 talk.

ENGL702601 Seminar: Aesthetics: Philosophy, Politics, Art Lehman, Robert S Spring 2022
Aesthetics: Philosophy, Politics, Art Lehman, Robert S Spring 2022

Fulfills the graduate theory requirement. This course will be a discussion-driven survey of aesthetics—that subdiscipline of critical thought that attempts to answer the fundamental questions of what art is and what role it plays in our lives. Over the course of the semester, we will likely read texts by philosophers and critics including Immanuel Kant, Paul de Man, Arthur Danto, Stanley Cavell, and Jacques Ranciére; and we will consider works by writers and visual artists such as Marcel Duchamp, Andy Warhol, Alexander Kluge, and Ben Lerner. Specific topics to be addressed will include: the relationship between subjective and objective claims about beauty; the connection of aesthetic experience to political activity; the challenge of modernism to classical standards of taste; and the so-called end of art. The course will be of interest to students of literature, music, visual art, and philosophy.

ENGL702701
Inhabiting Narrative Tanner, Laura E
Spring 2022
This class will explore the way that different narrative forms, including the novel, the short story, film, photography and graphic memoir, capture the rhythms of consciousness, emotion, habit, spatial orientation and embodiment. Focusing on the tension between everyday experience and heightened moments of crisis or insight, we will consider how narrative captures the elusive and complex dynamics of embodied subjectivity through voice, image and form. We will focus on narratives of the last century, including literature by Faulkner, Hemingway, Morrison, Robinson, and DeLillo, films including Lost in Translation, Rachel Getting Married and What Maisie Knew, and photography collections by Shellebrue Thurbur, Nicholas Nixon and Andrew Moore. We will contextualize these works with snippets of narrative theory, phenomenology, and everyday life theory.

English Language Training for Graduate Level Students: Focus on Writing Anderson, Lynne C
Spring 2022
Designed for those whose first language is not English, this course offers students practice writing in a range of academic modes including reflection, summary, analysis, and critique. Early in the semester, students will explore the composition process from brainstorming to drafting to revision to editing. Grammar is taught in the context of student writing. Several classes will be devoted to e-mail, reference letter, and proposal writing. Non-credit, offered free of charge by GSAS to its students during the spring. Department permission required. Students who enrol in the course are expected to attend all classes and complete short writing assignments weekly. The course is restricted to students in the Morrissey Graduate School of Arts and Sciences. If space permits, students from other schools will be considered. Admission to the course is by application and permission of the instructor.

ENGL770601
English Medieval Romance: Difference and Desire Stanton, Robert G
Spring 2022
This course reads romances as nostalgic expressions of desire: for readable national pasts, authorizing foundation myths, satisfying fantasies of gender relations. Complex questions of audience (such as the relation between "popular romance," a perceived lower/middle class, and high-status aristocratic and French texts) and cultural relations (Saxon and Celtic traditions jostled with French literary models as English re-emerged after suppression under the Normans) will help us characterize the social and political force of the genre(s). We will examine questions of gender construction, class irritation, desire for origins, and the limits of the romance genre, deploying mythography, postcolonial criticism, and orality theory.

Open to undergraduates with permission of instructor only
Fulfils a Ph.D. requirement in Romance Languages and Literatures. This course is organized as an introduction to the reading of literary theory for graduate students in various disciplines. Its aim is to develop an awareness of and sensitivity to the specific means and consequences of interpreting literary and extra-literary language today. The course allows students to acquire a basic familiarity with some of the most formative linguistic, philosophical, and anthropological antecedents underpinning any attempt to understand and account for the special status reserved for rhetorical language in literature or beyond it. Readings from Saussure, Lvi-Strauss, Jakobson, Barthes, Lacan, Ricoeur, Geertz, Austin, Derrida, and de Man, among others.

Issues and Methods in American Studies Klein, Christina
Spring 2022
This course offers an introduction to the field of American Studies, which focuses on the interdisciplinary study of American culture. We will read a range of recent scholarship, exploring diverse approaches, methods, and issues of interest. In the process, we will assemble "a tool kit" of critical skills for making interpretive arguments about works of culture in their historical moments. The cultural forms we analyze may include popular fiction, film, music, painting, and material cultures. Students write a research paper on a cultural artifact of their own choosing.

Capstone: Digital Humanities as Public Scholarship Lehman, Brittany; Naglak, Matthew
Spring 2022
Many schools across the United States teach different versions of survey classes for which instructors have to reach outside their own focuses. To do so, those instructors often search for visualizations of historical change, literary development, and examinations of religious narratives, depending on the field and course. In this capstone, graduate students will develop projects within their areas of specializations to produce digestible digital exhibits, visualizations, and more that can be made freely available to scholars across the world. The goal would be to promote the free exchange of high quality information and digital sources available in the public domain. Furthermore, through the capstone, students should understand the process of a project from conception to presentation. They should have developed skills engaging metadata, transcription, the process of digitization, and more. Students can bring their own research data from their dissertation project or from previous coursework, or they can be provided with a historical or literary dataset from the Boston College Libraries to utilize over the semester. There are four phases to the class, beginning with performing an environmental scan and writing a proposal for their project. In Phase II and III, students will implement and carry out their projects. Finally in Phase IV, students will engage in peer consulting and prepare their work for online publication.

Composition Theory and the Teaching of Writing Mathieu, Paul
Spring 2022
This course is designed to (1) prepare graduate students to teach introductory, college-level writing courses; (2) introduce students to central issues, problems, and theories in composition studies; and (3) encourage students to examine the interanimator relationship between critical theory, practical writing experience, and the teaching of Composition/Rhetoric. Though the emphasis is on central, nuts-and-bolts tasks in the teaching of writing (e.g., designing assignments; responding to student essays; selecting texts for discussion; etc.), this is not a prescriptive "how to" course; students are asked to consider pedagogical issues and choices in composition studies from a variety of personal and theoretical perspectives.

Ph.D. Seminar: The City in Literature and Film Rotella, Carlo
Spring 2022
This PhD seminar examines how novels, films, and other forms have engaged the interlinked formal, social, and conceptual problems and possibilities offered by cities. We will concentrate, in particular, on thinking about ways to connect interpretive readings of texts to the histories and defining qualities of cities. Areas of emphasis will likely include the interplay between textual form and urban form, how different genres exploit classically urban processes such as development and urbanization, neighborhood stories as regionalism, and the role of fictional one. Primary texts will be mostly American and 20th century—many instructors have to reach outside their own focuses. To do so, those instructors often search for visualizations of historical change, literary development, and examinations of religious narratives, depending on the field and course. This Land is Your Land: U. S. Environmental History Valencius, Connie B Fall 2021
This course will survey main themes and events in the environmental history of the United States. We move from colonial-era differences in land use through contemporary environmental debates. We ask how American communities have used, defined, and fought over places and natural resources, from bison herds to nuclear stockpiles. We investigate intriguing aspects of our local Massachusetts environment: the Emerald Necklace of parks, the braxx hoots of Harvard Square, even our nearby reservoir. No background in history is necessary to thrive in this class. Students in the sciences are welcome.

Course offered for Sophomores only.. How does housing affect the lives of Americans? Where you live determines your access to schools, quality of healthcare, fresh food, clean air, parks, and recreation, affordable credit, and even how long you are likely to live. This course explores concepts of housing policy and planning at the national, state, and local levels. It examines programs and policies used to subsidize housing for millions of Americans and help them gain access to a decent place to live. Topics will be considered from multiple perspectives including housing finance, design, community planning, inequality, operations management, and sustainability. We will explore the historical and economic context of U.S. housing and discuss the barriers that low-income families face that affects their access to decent housing. The course will be divided into three sections: history, policies, and today’s issues. Students will explore some of the most recently developed programs and how they fit into effective community revitalization. These programs will be evaluated in class discussions and group presentations.

ENVS333201
Marine Conservation Science Offen, Vena Fall 2021
This course explores the threats to marine diversity, and the ways in which we can preserve diversity. Covering principles from marine science, ecology and conservation biology, we ask what role does diversity play in marine ecosystems, and what are the consequences of diversity loss to ecosystem function and services. We investigate major threats to marine diversity including marine pollution, species invasion, commercial fishing, and climate change impacts.
Through review of the primary literature and guided discussions, students learn about conservation efforts at the local, national and international levels, with emphasis on marine protected areas and fisheries management.

ENV5332202 Marine Conservation Science

This course introduces students to a wide spectrum of wild animal issues and services through an interactive and interdisciplinary lens. The course captures the diversity of both negative and positive interactions between humans and wildlife in rural and urban contexts. The course covers: the ecological, social, and economic significance of wild animal species; interactions between wild, human, and domesticated species that facilitate the spread of zoonotic diseases; the impact of habitat degradation and climate change on wild animal species’ geographical range and population; how species are adapting to smaller spaces and altered climates; and the urgency to protect Earth’s biodiversity and the ecosystem services they provide.

ENV5334501 Seminar in Environmental Law

This seminar is intended for undergraduates interested in environmental law and policy. It covers selected topics in depth and thus is a good supplement to the introductory Environmental Law and Policy course, although the introductory course is not a required prerequisite. Topics covered include (1) the Clean Water Act and the Boston Harbor cleanup; (2) the RCRA hazardous waste regulations; (3) contaminated (both superfund and brownfield) site cleanups; and (4) sustainability/toxic use reduction efforts by businesses. This course will emphasize the practical aspects of environmental law and policy including learning how to read and understand environmental regulations and permits, and will include several written exercises. This course is open to seniors, juniors and sophomores.

ENV540601 Place-making in a Post-carbon World: Architecture and Landscape for a Sustainable Future
Burns, Jennifer L Fall 2021

Since the rise of steam power in the nineteenth century, the American way of life has been premised upon ever-increasing consumption of fossil fuels in all aspects of our economy, from agriculture and manufacturing, trade and transportation, to communications and computing. In this course, we focus on a single aspect of this carbon-reliant economy, one that centrally and intimately shapes our patterns of life, our energy use, and our expectations of comfort. Focusing on architecture and landscape design, we review the dominant patterns of building and dwelling from before and during the Industrial Revolution in the U.S. We then examine a substantial series of alternative, sustainable strategies for constructing our shelters and their surrounding landscapes.

Environmental Studies Courses: Spring 2022
ENVS110501
Society and Environmental Transformations Thombs, Ryan P Spring 2022
Where do contemporary environmental problems come from? Why is it so hard to resolve serious global environmental issues? Are environmental problems really social problems? This course will compel students to explore these questions, to devise answers to them, and to learn how to understand environmental problems with sociological analytical tools and methods.
Students will explore the historical origins of the contemporary world, revisit the social and environmental changes brought about by the Industrial Revolution, the World Wars, and the liberalization of capitalism, and, through first-hand research, ponder how globalization might be the start of a new environmental transformation for society.

We have control over our identities or do we? We assume that identity means our sense of self, or that it reflects who we are because of our personality and experiences. This description indicates that we have control over our identities but do we? Identity is not just individual, it is also collective because it denotes social markers like race, gender, sexuality, language, and religion. Focusing on race, these paired courses explore the ambiguities and tensions between individual and collective identities, as well as how racial identity formation in the U.S. is mediated by outside forces. Key topics will include how space and place mediate racial identity, but also how racial discourse recycles racist ideas to predetermine how racial groups can be seen, known, and imagined. By surveying literature, film, and music while interrogating concepts like mobility/containment, inclusion/exclusion, and belonging/alienation, we will see how people have created and contested the boundaries of racial and spatial divisions across the U.S.

Global Environmental Justice and Conservation Cross-Camp, Nicole D Spring 2022
The concept of environmental justice - that nature is not only found in wilderness, but also in the places where we live and work - revises our understanding of environmentalism to include both National Parks and nuclear waste sites, wild rivers and mega-dams. The literature on environmental justice provides narratives of individuals and communities organizing and responding to economic and environmental problems on local, national, and international levels. Its stories and investigations show that environmental issues are deeply connected with issues of globalization, gender, race and class. In this deeply interdisciplinary course, we will explore the concept of global environmental justice within the context of conservation; reflecting on the historical foundations of conservation and increasing attention to 'just' conservation. By the end of this course, you will have been exposed to ways in which environmental justice connects to issues of ethics, social justice, civic engagement, and, hopefully - your own life.

Environmental Sociology I Jorgenson, Andrew K Spring 2022
This is a reading and discussion seminar that provides an overview of theoretical and empirical work in environmental sociology. After a brief introduction to the origins of the field, the seminar will cover topics that are representative of what is current in the area, especially bodies of theory and research that are national, international, and global in scope and research that is structural in orientation, with a key focus on how large-scale social institutions and organizational forms impact the environment, and also how they shape the ways in which individuals and smaller groups interact with the natural environment. Attention is also given to how environmental sociology makes fundamental contributions to interdisciplinary research in environmental studies and sustainability science.

For ENVS majors and seniors only. This is the second-half of a year-long course... This year-long seminar is for seniors who are majors in the Environmental Studies Program. To assist with the transition from college to the next stage of a student's career, the seminar focuses on the further development of applied multidisciplinary research, accessible writing, project coordination, and public speaking skills. Students spend the first semester engaging with scholarly materials and developing proposals for a research project. During the second semester, students complete their research projects, potentially collaborating with a campus or community organization to address an environmental problem.

Film Courses: Summer 2021

FILM227802
Film, Literature and Law DEPT
Summer 2021
Interest in the rapport between film and literature as it relates to the law intrigues us as much today as ever. Literature captures the drama of a legal trial or an investigation into a brutal, racial murder. Film then takes this rich material and shapes it into a compelling form with dynamic visuals and other narrative techniques. The course explores the power of story-telling and the impact of film to embody and inhabit law and its relationship to ideas about inferiority, liberty, citizenry, race, justice, crime, punishment, and social order. Film adaptations from short stories, plays, and novels will comprise the body of the curriculum.

Russian Cinema Epstein, Thomas Fall 2021
This survey of Russian cinema will focus on the development of the seventh art in Russia and the former Soviet Union from 1913 to 2017. Focusing on the films and theoretical writings of three iconic Russian film makers (Sergei Eisenstein, Andrey Tarkovsky, and Andrey Zvyagintsev), we will also explore film theory outside Russia and watch other individual Russian film masterpieces, some at the margins of the canon. While film artistry will be at the center of our attention, Russian and Soviet history of the period will also be explored. We will screen our films on Tuesday evenings, hold class on Wednesdays.

FILM300501
Italian Cinema: Passion, Politics, and Pain Michalczuk, Susan A Fall 2021
Social issues dominate Italian cinema from the post-WWII era to the present, as filmmakers interpret individual historical moments, literary works, and cultural events, bringing a collective experience of the human condition onto the screen. Visconti establishes the foundation that Fellini, Bertolucci, Rosi, and other directors build upon, creating visual images that evolve from Giovanni Verga, and his written portraits of Southern Italy. Exploring what is true and real, questioning the complexity of the human condition in moments of comedy and tragedy, these films depict socio-economic, philosophical, and political issues, always revolving around the vulnerability and struggles of relationships. Films include: La Terra Tremenda, Obsession, Open City, Bicycle Thieves, La Strada, Il Conformista, Tree of Wooden Clogs, Bread and Chocolate, Life is Beautiful, Tre Fratelli, Cinema Paradiso, Bread and Tulips, Gomorrah.

FILM330101
Screenwriter Shatraw, Justin Fall 2021
This course will explore the role of the screenwriter in the film making process, from original idea to the finished screenplay and film. Students will also learn how the screenwriter adapts source material such as plays, novels, and real life events. Along the way, students will learn about each of the elements of screenwriting including: structure, character, dialogue, theme, genre and breaking rules. Both individually and as a classroom project, students will read television studies; and new media theories. Students will learn how to apply and theoretically engage visual media. We will cover topics including: film aesthetics; Marxist, psychoanalytic, feminist, critical race, and queer theoretical approaches to film criticism; television studies; and new media theories. Students will learn how to analyze film on a formal level, taking into account how form creates meaning, and to think historically and theoretically about how film as art and commerce has contributed to shaping "smaller screen" media forms and understandings.

Advanced Screenwriting Conroy, Mary K
Fall 2021
Limited to 15 students. This course is for students interested in writing for film, applying the knowledge gained in FILM3310 toward their efforts at writing their own screenplays. In the early part of the class, students will select an idea for a film and transform that idea into a story suitable for the screen. From there, in a round-table setting, students will complete a series of exercises to help them focus their stories, eventually moving on to writing a finished first act (28-30 pages) by the semester's end.

The Comic Film
La Rocca, Joseph P Fall 2021
Laughter is a universal phenomenon seen widely in films from the birth of cinema in Lumiere Brothers' short clips to the current spoofs and mockumentaries. This class will trace the evolution of comedy in film from the early silent films (Chaplin), through intellectual comedies (Woody Allen), to the most recent comedies on screen today. The survey will analyze the psychological and sociological essence of comedy in its various forms from slapstick and situational comedy to word-plays and clever one-liners.

Cold War Revisited on Screen Michalczyk, John
Fall 2021 TBD
This series will concentrate on several directors who have chosen to work on the East Coast rather than in the Hollywood mainstream, such as Martin Scorsese, Spike Lee, Sidney Lumet, Elia Kazan and Woody Allen. Many have roots in New York and use the city not only as a setting for their narratives but as a metaphor for the human condition they explore. This school of Urban Realism has enriched American film with a gritty documentary strain that stands in strong contrast to the polished Hollywood style.

FILM170101 Coming of Age: Crisis and Calm Revealed through Film Michalczyk, John Spring 2022
Core Renewal: Enduring Questions For Freshmen Only Coming of age, whether in moments of conflict or peace, remains a central theme in both classic and contemporary films. Film adaptation offers opportunities to study issues confronted from early to late adolescence that affect our adult lives. Viewing moments of crisis and calm through the medium of film has aesthetic value and promotes increased visual and cultural literacy. The films serve as foundational texts, as students engage in understanding the complexities of adapting a singular account of adolescence from printed word to the screen so as to reveal the relevance for our own lives.

FILM228201 Political Fiction Film Michalczyk, John Spring 2022
Political fiction film has often served as a dramatic means to deliver an ideological message. Its roots go back to Griffith's Civil War epic Birth of a Nation (1915). During World War II with... such popular films as Casablanca, Hollywood directors offered patriotic messages to an American audience with its recent history of isolationism. More recently, Costa-Gavras’ Z (1969) combined thriller elements with a non-conventional political perspective. Through readings, screenings, and discussion of these and other works, we are able to analyze the dual components of drama and politics in a chronological manner.

Latin American Film and Media Livon-Grosman, Ernesto
Spring 2022

The purpose of this course is to explore how contemporary Latin American film and other audiovisual media have approached the subject of representation in both documentary and narrative cinema. We will focus broadly on two themes and four decades: the relationship between art and politics and how film and other media represent the connection between art and personal narratives from the 60s to the 2000s. Analyzing the cinematographic and editing techniques as well as reading critical texts on film and Latin America we will discuss how different media construct a narrative and how they influence the representation of history. Film in Spanish and English with English subtitles. Satisfies one of three elective courses within the Communication major

From Word to Image: In Search of the Essay Film Livon-Grosman, Ernesto
Spring 2022
This course will look at the essay film from the 1950s to the present. Through the history of the essay as a genre and its cinematic life, we will examine those films that bring together text and image as well as the private and the public. During this writing-intensive course, we will follow the thread that connects all the elements of the essay as a genre. We will discuss essays by Montaigne, Theodor Adorno, Timothy Corrigan, and Norah Alter and the films of iconic filmmakers such as Chris Marker, Nicolás Guillén Landrín, Albertina Carri, Harun Farocki, and Agnes Varda, among others. How are those films shaped by constantly changing social circumstances? What do they tell us about the social and political conditions in which they were made? And how do they relate to other film practices around the world? In addition to the critical readings, the students will watch movies outside class time. Films in multiple languages always with English subtitles.  Satisfies one of two writing intensives courses

War/Twentieth-Century France Breines, Joseph

Fall 2021

Our focus this semester will be on the artistic, intellectual, political, and social life of France during the period of the Second World War. We will be reading poetry and short stories published during the Occupation, recent magazine articles on the clandestine press, an anti-war play from the immediate pre-war period, essays published just after the Liberation, and very short selections on the history of the period. We will see a number of recent French films whose stories draw on the dynamics and psychology of resistance and collaboration. We will hear recollections of the Liberation of Paris, interviews with men who joined the Charlemagne division of the German "SS," and songs from the period. While the main focus will be on the Second World War, we will begin the course with two texts (a short story and a poem) written just after the Franco-Prussian War (1870-71).

Fall 2021
In this course, we will investigate the nineteenth-century dream of synesthesia: the idea that the senses, far from being distinct, are intimately intertwined. Considering a range of painterly, poetic, fictional, musical, and scientific artifacts, we will study the nature of nineteenth-century synesthesia, as well as the feeling body that it implies. Over the course of our inquiry, we will consider works by, among others, Charles Baudelaire, Richard Wagner, Honor de Balzac, Thophile Gautier, Arthur Rimbaud, Stephane Mallarme, and J.K. Huysmans.

Enfance Capitale Yamaguchi, Liesl Spring 2022
What is it like to grow up in Paris, City of Lights? In this course, we will explore the French capital in the company of its more youthful residents, accompanying them from their sumptuous apartments overlooking the Jardin de Luxembourg to their colorful-if cramped-quarters in the Belleville and the Parisian banlieue. Through literary texts and a few films drawn from the 19th through 21st centuries, we will study representations of childhood in the French capital, attending particularly to the ways in which childhood experiences are seen to confer, or fail to confer, le capital social–social capital. Topics to be explored include linguistic identity and class formation, education and gender acquisition, evolving structures of discrimination, memory and projection, and the role of language in shaping categories of identity. GERM300801
German Fairy Tales Old and New Burwick, William
Fall 2021
Conducted in English. Counts toward German Major/Minor and German Studies Minor. Perhaps the most quintessential German genre, the fairy tale, or Maerchen, is synonymous with German literature the world over while also having fundamentally changed the course of German literary history since 1800. This course explores the miniature form, its history, and its cultural influence in guises both classic (Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm) and contemporary. Together we will explore the social, cultural, educative, and political functions of fairy tales across the nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first centuries and seek to understand the formative role of popular folk literature in the development of German self-understanding. To what extent are fairy tales children's literature? How did their varied but recognizable typologies come about? What place do Volksmaerchen and Kunstmaerchen have in recent German culture? These are but some of the questions we will pose as we traverse this magical literary landscape of ethical conflicts and eerie nightmares. This course is designed as an interactive seminar requiring dynamic student participation.

Germany in Europe today Sondermann, Ruth Spring 2022
This course is intended to introduce students to today's Germany in Europe. The European Union and the four freedoms of the EU—free movement of people, goods, services, and capital—will be the chief topic of this course. Other topics will include the new influx of migrants and other demographic changes, the education system, and the opportunities that education offers. Because Germans are very concerned about the effects of environmental change, the course will also address the idea of sustainability, the sharing and caring society, and Fair Trade. This course is a language course offered to students from all majors who are contemplating a semester abroad, an internship, or even working in Germany. We will be listening to podcasts and the news and will read authentic material. You should therefore be quite confident in your German language skills, be able to discuss and present your opinions and write short essays. If you are uncertain about your level, please do not hesitate to contact the instructor.

Collecting, Order, Displaying Power: The History of the Modern Museum Burwick, William Spring 2022
In this course we will discuss the history and the politics of museums. Our topic will be the formation of modern museums from private collections, eclectic and arcane “Wunderkammern” of the early modern period, 19th century national museums, to the contemporary museums and exhibits. This includes not only what people decided to collect and display, but how people choose to curate displays as expression of cultural and national identity. We also investigate architecture, location, and other relevant special contexts in and around museums. We will discuss both art and natural history museums by focusing on changes in architecture and philosophy of display. We will read Thomas Bernhard's novel Old Masters as well as ancillary texts to gain a better understanding of the development of modern museums and the politics that shaped them.

GERM223901
Knights, Castles, and Dragons Resler, Michael Spring 2022
Conducted in English with all texts in English translation. No knowledge of German is required. Counts toward German major, German minor, and German Studies minor. A study of the masterpieces of the first great blossoming in German literature including The Nibelungenlied, Tristan, and Hartmann von Aue’s Erec. Central to the works of this age are (1) the rise of knighthood and (2) the spreading to Germany of the legend of King Arthur and the knights of the Round Table. In addition, older Germanic- heroic influences will be examined in certain of the works. The literature will be discussed in the larger context of its sociological and historical background. The literary traditions of France will be systematically linked to contemporary developments in Germany.

SPAN660401
Tradition and Counterculture in Mexico Shames, David A Spring 2022

How can we rethink the global political and economic upheavals of 1960s/1970s through the lens of a clash between tradition and counterculture? In this course, students will explore multiple dimensions of question by taking Mexico as a case study. We will examine the possibilities and dead ends of different counter-cultural proposals put forth by three paradigmatic figures in 20th century Mexican history: artists, guerrilla insurgents, and economist. We will delve into the cultural and political contexts against which Mexicans were rebelling, and analyze how different sectors of Mexican society approached issues of economic development, utopia, and radical self-expression. Course is taught in Spanish.

The Gender Games, from El Cid to Almodóvar Rhodes, Elizabeth
Spring 2022
This course, whose title takes a cue from The Hunger Games, analyzes how culture "encourages" individuals to conform to a particular set of gender expectations at a given moment in history. Considering how texts of various genres and media represent what means to be "a man," "a woman," or someone who identifies with both or neither, we will analyze how various art forms respond to established gender norms to support or subvert them, from the Middle Ages through contemporary Spain. Course conducted in Spanish. Experience with gender analysis helpful but not necessary.

Anchored in close readings of primary sources, especially the first-person accounts of contemporaries, this core course considers the history of Latin America from the pre-contact period to roughly 1800. It follows the individual, communal, institutional, and national stories of transformation in order to understand how people in this region became Latin American. This course places a particular emphasis on questions of difference and power, considering how race, gender, and imperial structures shaped society. Methodologically, the course aims to highlight the work of interpretation, reflection, and imagination in the practice of history.

War and Peace: History and Literary Truths Eaton, Nicole M Fall 2021
This is an Enduring Questions course and is open to FRESHMEN only. You must take UNAS1715 with this course. How does War and Peace speak through its historical context and as a description of a perennial human situation? War and Peace is a great and massive novel. Its primary subject, the effect of the Napoleonic Wars on Russia, may seem distant from our contemporary concerns. Yet its fundamental questions How shall I live and what is worth dying for? Is war a necessary evil, or something greater, or different? How does our social-historical experience construct our identity? Are as relevant today as ever. Approaching these and other questions from our separate disciplines, we will attend both to the historical and literary context in which War and Peace was written and to the ways it speaks to us today.

The Worlds of Moby-Dick: What Historical Forces Shape a Book's "Greatness"? Quigley, David Fall 2021
Core Renewal Course: Enduring Questions. As an Enduring Questions course (linked with ENGL1714), this course explores the historical contexts of Herman Melville’s Moby-Dick. First published in 1851 as the United States hustled toward civil war, the novel reflects the cultural, political, and economic fault lines of nineteenth-century America. We will read a range of texts that illuminate the histories of New Bedford, Manhattan, antebellum America, and the globalizing economy of the era.

Geographies of Imperialism: History of Colonization Shlala, Elizabeth H Fall 2021
This is an Enduring Questions course and is open to Freshman only. This course must be taken with THEO1707. The age of empires is past—or is it? In this course, we examine the enduring ideas of empires and their challengers through the present day, using the lenses of history and theology (Christianity and Islam). Beginning with the traditional geographies of maps, we explore how empires colonized not only territories with physical borders, but also bodies and minds, using race, gender, sexuality, ethnicity, education, laws and institutions. Using the British and French empires in the Middle East and North Africa as case studies, we will identify and question how to overcome the boundaries still imposed on people today.

African American History I Miller, Karen
This two-semester course examines the history and culture of African-Americans from the pre-colonial period to the present. The first semester treats the period before the middle passage, the evolution of slave and free society, the development of Black institutions, and the emergence of protest movements through the Civil War’s end. During the second semester, the emphasis is placed on issues of freedom and equality from Reconstruction, urban migration, and civil rights struggles through current consideration of race, class, and gender conflicts.

Core Topics: When Worlds Collide: From Contact to the Constitution Lyerly, Cynthia L
Fall 2021
This course will examine North American history from the perspective of the collision and exchange of cultures and peoples. From the Mississippian Indian civilization at Cahokia to the Illinois, Iroquois, Algonkian, and other Native American peoples, we will see how Indians resisted, adapted, and interacted with French, English, Spanish, and Dutch Europeans. African peoples were another key part of this cultural collision, as hundreds of thousands were brought to North America in the slave trade. The course ends with the consolidation of white European power in the creation of the United States. Major themes in the course are race, power, and religion.

Russia under the Tsars Eaton, Nicole M
Fall 2021
In 1721, Peter the Great declared that Russia would be an Empire. That empire survived for almost two hundred years. This course will survey central issues in imperial Russian history, focusing on how the rulers of the Romanov dynasty solidified their rule and incorporated peoples of diverse cultures. Although Peter’s dream collapsed in 1917, the key question to be asked in this course is: given all the forces threatening to tear the Russian Empire apart for so long, how was it that it survived—and even expanded—for so long?

This Land is Your Land: U. S. Environmental History Valencius, Conevery B
Fall 2021
How have different environments, places, and resources shaped American history? We will survey main themes and events in the environmental history of the United States. We move from colonial-era differences in land use through contemporary environmental debates. We ask how American communities have used, defined, and fought over places and natural resources, from bison herds to nuclear stockpiles. We investigate intriguing aspects of our local Massachusetts environment: the Emerald Necklace of parks, the bra's hoof prints of Harvard Square, even our nearby reservoir. No background in history is necessary to thrive in this class. Students in the sciences are welcome.

U.S. War and Reconstruction Valencius, Conevery B
Fall 2021
A hundred and fifty years ago, one part of the United States declared its independence as a separate nation. It almost succeeded. Why did Southern whites seek to secede and did other Americans resist? What were the legacies of war, emancipation, and Reconstruction? We will investigate how agriculture, racial slavery, economics, environments, foreign relations, naval war, field tactics, and free and enslaved Americans shaped this wrenching upheaval. Through historical accounts, images, music, and discussion, we will explore the causes of the Civil War of 1861-1865, its military and social course, and its consequences for a bloodied and re-made Union.

Race and Identity in African American History

Fall 2021

This course examines and engages readings that reflect a variety of approaches to questions of racial identity and "American-ness" over time. Textual materials have been selected to illustrate both historical and literary treatments of "race" and "identity" within the context of the United States. How do individuals become conscious of themselves as "racial" beings and as national citizens? How do racial identities comport with other identities? How does racial identity influence or color one's sense of self and relations with others within and outside of one's race? How, ultimately, does race impact the study and writing of history over time?

Metropolitan America: Cities and Suburbs in the Twentieth Century Glass, Michael

In 1920, a majority of Americans lived in cities for the first time. By 1990, a majority lived in suburbs. These dramatic shifts influenced every facet of life, from politics to economics, labor to culture. This course surveys these transformations in metropolitan America during the twentieth century. We will examine the history of the built environment; analyze changes in housing, business, work, and consumption; follow the movement of people, capital, and ideas; and assess how various institutions shaped the fate of urban and suburban communities.

HIST448501 History of Medicine and Public Health/Mtr Am Diaspora Summers, Martin A Fall 2021 This course is a comparative study of the complex historical interplay of medicine, ideas of racial difference, and relationships of power in the African diaspora. Through an examination of slavery in the Americas, colonialism in Africa, and race relations in postemancipation United States and Caribbean, this course explores the ways in which racial difference has acquired a particular truth through the production of biomedical knowledge and its deployment in therapeutic practice and public health policy. The course will also examine how people of African descent have used medical knowledge and healing practices to contest their subordinate position in racist societies.

HIST449501 U.S. Foreign Policy I Jacobs, Seth S Fall 2021 This course is the first half of a two semester survey of the history of U.S. foreign relations from the Revolutionary War through the present day. Students will examine conflicting interpretations of America’s role in the world and trace how that role has changed as the nation grew from thirteen isolated, parochial communities on the Atlantic coast to the greatest military and economic superpower in history. Important topics include the territorial expansion of the American empire, the development of - and debate over - constitutional powers, and the struggle for American markets in Asia and elsewhere.

HIST450001 Street Life: Urban Space and Popular Culture Johnson, Marilyn Fall 2021 This course looks at the production and uses of urban space through street life and public sociability. Analyzing spatial relations in European, American, and Asian cities, we will explore how ordinary people in the past and present experienced everyday life and how contests over urban space revealed power relations and social identities of gender, class, and race/ethnicity. Beginning in the early modern era, we’ll be looking at commonplace street activities such as walking, parading, performance, peddling, slumming, and tourism. Well also explore the evolving cultures of popular urban spaces like parks, cafes/restaurants, markets, shrines, and public squares. For a final project, students will work collaboratively to develop a digital mapping project on the history of ethnic food and restaurants in Boston.

HIST455301 American Hate Lyerly, Cynthia L Fall 2021 Racism is, unfortunately, as American as apple pie and baseball. This course explores the roots of racial hatred and the changes in American racism over time. In addition to studying the ideas that buttress racism, this course will examine case studies of racism in practice, such as the Tuskegee syphilis experiment, convict leasing, segregated recreation, the Trail of Tears and Japanese internment.

HIST424501 The Witch, the Church, and the Law Reinburg, Virginia Fall 2021 During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries a convergence of political, social, and religious movements produced thousands of trials for crimes of witchcraft, sorcery, and superstition throughout Europe and in North America. This course explores these trials, particularly emphasizing their legal and ecclesiastical aspects. Related issues of popular belief in sorcery, magic, and diabolical activity will also be considered. Attention will be devoted to the question of why women were so frequently among the accused.

HIST425001 Human Rights as History Pendas, Devin O Fall 2021 One of the major developments in world history since World War II has been the rise of a universal human rights culture. This course will explore this development in historical perspective, tracing the origins of the language of human rights back to the eighteenth century and the French Revolution and interrogating its development in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. We will examine the potential of “human rights” in international politics but also the limitations of human rights claims. We will ask who has rights and when and who the major actors are in pushing rights claims: governments, revolutionaries, and NGOs.

HIST428201 The Northern Ireland Troubles Through Film and Media Savage, Robert J Fall 2021 Formerly titled History of Northern Ireland, 1912 to the Present This course will explore the Troubles by using a variety of sources to gain a comprehensive understanding of the conflict. We will consider how historians, filmmakers, the broadcast media and creative writers have addressed the Troubles and consider key events that defined a deeply divided society. The course will address how the broadcast media helped undermine the Stormont Government and challenge British policy throughout the conflict. It will address key events including the campaign for civil rights, the role of the Provisional IRA and Loyalist paramilitaries, the peace process which produced the landmark Good Friday Agreement in 1998 and the threat Brexit poses to the stability of Northern Ireland today.

HIST428301 Disuniting Kingdom Savage, Robert J Fall 2021 This course will provide an overview of British and Irish history in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries by exploring issues of nationalism and culture within both the United Kingdom and Ireland. Although Ireland and Irish-British relations will be the primary focus of the course, students will also consider how Scotland and Wales have developed dual identities which enable citizens of both nations to consider themselves “British” as well as Scottish or Welsh.

HIST429201 War and Genocide Pendans, Devin O Fall 2021 Genocide has been one of the most tragic and disturbing global phenomena of the twentieth century. It has been truly global in scope, striking Asia, Africa, the Americas, and Europe. In this course, we will explore the history of genocide and its relationship to war in global perspective, from the colonial genocides of the nineteenth century, the Armenian genocide in WWI, the Holocaust in WWII, and the postcolonial genocides since 1945. We will also ask what might be done on an international level to combat genocide—either through military intervention or through legal prosecution.

HIST53001
Senior Colloquium: Global Borderlands Picone, Maria de los Angeles Fall 2021
Border regions bring together two seemingly opposing concepts: the definition of dividing line and the looseness of an undefined area. They condense meanings of confrontation and encounter, of division and exchange, of mobility and rigidity. This course will examine studies on border regions, from across the globe since 1750. We will read together works that shape American history. In the process, we will try to figure out what makes a book a “classic”, and who is welcome to write one.

HIST540501
Senior Colloquium: Classics in the Writing of U.S. History Richardson, Heather C Fall 2021
Aren’t there a number of classic works of American history that everyone must read? Actually, there are a number of classic works of American history that everyone should read, but not many people ever do. These books are not necessarily right—they are desperately wrong—but they all changed the study of American history. They were touchstones for their generation, and their influence echoes down to the present. This course will examine the texts that shaped American history. In the process, we will try to figure out what makes a book a “classic”, and who is welcome to write one.

Graduate Colloquium: Global Migrations and Diasporas Oh, Arissa H

Fall 2021

In this course we will read broadly about the histories of migrations from, to, and within various countries and regions in the world as well as the creation and perpetuation of diasporas. In all cases we will be attentive not just to the usual categories of race, class, gender and sexuality, but also to the way these global migrations and diasporas shape, and are shaped by, other factors such as environmental change, nationalisms, and borders and borderlands.

HIST223001
Greco-Roman Egypt DEPT
Spring 2022
Under rule by the Ptolemaic dynasty, Egypt became the cultural hub of the ancient Mediterranean; when governed by Rome, it provided natural resources to a vast empire. But what of its multiethnic and multilingual population (the indigenous Egyptians, Nubians, Jews, Romans, Greeks, Arabs who inhabited it) and how did Egypt in this period relate to the rest of Africa and neighboring ancient civilizations? By studying literary, documentary, and visual sources, we will examine several fascinating historical figures such as Alexander the Great, Ptolemy Philadelphus, and perhaps the most notorious woman in antiquity, Cleopatra VII. Students will also encounter first-hand evidence of daily life in this region through letters, contracts, petitions, and arrest warrants recorded on potsherds and papyri and preserved for millennia by the desert sands.

HIST222501
Ancient Medicine Eshleman, Kendra J Spring 2022
This course introduces students to the practice and theory of medicine in ancient Greece and Rome, from the archaic world of Homer (eighth century BCE) to late antiquity and early Christian healing practices. Themes will include shifting understandings of health and the body, revolutions in knowledge of human anatomy and physiology, ethical controversies over human and animal dissection, influential theories of pathology, psychology, pharmacology, and nutrition, the intersection of medicine and religion, and ancient ideas about doctors' responsibility, which, via the Hippocratic Oath, are still with us today. Students interested in history and literature will gain a richer sense of the importance of medicine in ancient society, and its connections to religion, magic and philosophy. Students from a medical and scientific background will discover how perceptions of the body have changed over time and from culture to culture.

HIST244101
U.S. Political History since 1968 Glass, Michael Spring 2022
This course explores the significant political developments that shaped the past fifty years of U.S. history, an era notable for declining faith in government, new rights claims by marginalized citizens, growing partisan polarization, and widening inequality. In addition to tracing the transformation of political parties and their ideological coalitions, we will also ask how social, economic, and cultural changes have influenced political life. Topics include the evolution of 1960s social movements, the rise of the religious Right, the War on Drugs and the carceral state, the AIDS crisis, the politics of globalization, the 2008 financial crisis, and the gig economy.

Focus on Civil Rights: The Montgomery Bus Boycott Miller, Karen Spring 2022
This course dissects the 382-day bus boycott by Montgomery, Alabama’s black residents. Though not the first protest of its kind, it introduced two iconic figures to the national stage: Martin Luther King, Jr. and Rosa Parks. Four simple questions provide the foundation for the boycott’s “voice” and “face,” even though he was a relative newcomer to the city? How did Montgomery’s black residents rally around Parks’ 1955 arrest? How did Rev. King become the boycott’s “voice” and “face,” even though he was a relative newcomer to the city? How did this lengthy boycott change Montgomery’s black community in the short term?

Vampires, Werewolves, and the Presidency Gallagher, Charles R Spring 2022
This survey course will examine the relationship between U.S. intelligence agencies and their impact on presidential decision-making. We will examine the history of intelligence and the presidency from the period of the American War for Independence through the present U.S. war actions in Iraq and Afghanistan. The course aims not only to provide a discussion of U.S. political history, but also incorporates elements of the relationship between intelligence studies and literature, philosophy, and religion. Questions of civil liberties, legal history, the role of Congress, and moral and ethical questions surrounding the gathering and effectuation of intelligence will be under study.

Colonial Past/Global Presents Kent, Stacie A
Spring 2022

Fulfills the Non-Western Requirement for History Majors. While scholars of globalization often proclaim the novelty of the present, historians have become suspicious that deeper connections exist between global, networked presents, and colonial pasts. In this course we will study a variety of colonial histories form the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and investigate whether and in what ways that history remains with us today. Our examples will come from Euroamerican colonial empires, and topics will include commodity production and circulation, work regimes, labor migrations, gender and sex, development, science, medicine, and racial epistemologies.

Colonial Korea and its Legacies Hwang, Ingu Spring 2022

This course explores Korea’s experience under Japanese colonial rule (1910-1945) as well as how this experience was remembered and represented in the post-colonial era. Students will explore the three phases of Japanese rule: military rule (1910-1919); cultural rule (1919-1931), and wartime mobilization (1931-1945) and how each of these phases have shaped and continue to shape Korean national identity and politics, socioeconomic development, and memory culture. The course draws on historical and literary texts as well as film and other visual sources. This course combines lecture with active student discussion and presentations.

HIST312001
Study and Writing: The Arabian Nights from Baghdad to Hollywood Sajdi, Dana Spring 2022

The seminar will examine the history of the famous Arabic popular oral romance, A Thousand and One Nights (Arabic, al layla wa layla), from its earliest Indian roots to its passage in Iran, to its incubation in medieval Baghdad, Damascus and Cairo, to its “discovery” by Victorian gentlemen, to its consumption all the way from Hawaii to Japan, to its adaptation to music, dance, film, and painting, to its production as a play here at BC this semester! Underlying the movement of the “Arabian Nights” from a regional Arabic popular romance to world literature is the colonial project. Thus, the history of The Arabian Nights from Baghdad to Hollywood touches on a wide range of important issues, including oral and written cultures, literary transitions to modernity, gender and sexuality, Orientalism, the colonial encounter, and the post-colonial condition. Students will learn how to treat different media of representation as sources for history and to discover in these cultural products clues, myths, and testimonies relating to politics, society, and economy.

Study and Writing of History: The Scientific Revolution Matus, Zachary A
Spring 2022

Fulfills major requirement for Study and Writing of History. What was the Scientific Revolution? Students will tackle this question as well as the very messy, all-too-human context of scientific development ca. 1450-1700. Using primary sources (in translation when necessary) including holdings from the Burns Library, students will engage with the philosophers, physicians, alchemists, astronomers, and explorers whose complicated relationship to historical authorities, other cultures, and empirical realities generated an explosion of literature on the natural world. This course culminates in an original research paper that links the production of scientific ideas to the oft untidy contexts from which they emerged.

Public Culture in Postwar Japan DEPT Spring 2022

Fulfills Non-Western Requirement for History Majors. This course explores Japanese public culture since 1945 in terms of institutions, debates, and the media. Topics may include war memory, U.S. military bases, changing social values concerning women and family, ethnic diversity, environmental protest, new (and old) religions, and icons of popular culture. The focus is on recent historical and anthropological work as well as literature and film. Students will have a chance to do some research into an area of their particular interest. Some background in twentieth century Japanese history is recommended.

The Asia Pacific War: A Transnational History Seraphim, Franziska Spring 2022

Fulfills the Non-Western Requirement for History Majors. This course explores the Second World War in Asia from multiple historical and historiographical perspectives. The term “Asia-Pacific War” explicitly links the conflict between Japan and the United States known as the Pacific War (1941-45) to Japan’s expansionist ventures in Korea, Taiwan, the Chinese mainland, and Southeast Asia, and considers the cultural and intellectual dimensions of the war (and the way it is remembered) along with the political and military ones.

Korean War: Conflict, Security, and Peace Hwang, Ingu
Spring 2022

The Korean War (1950-1953) began as a civil war but became a global conflict against the backdrop of the emerging Cold War era. Known as “the Forgotten War” in the U.S., this conflict resulted in 5 million deaths and left an indelible imprint on the world. Seven decades later the Korean peninsula remains divided, and the contentious international security mechanisms engendered by this conflict still shape East Asian relations and U.S. foreign policy. Through engagement with recent historical works, this seminar course will explore the origins... and legacies of this conflict, security options and limitations, and conditions and visions of peace.

Suspicious Minds: Marx, Nietzsche, Freud Bourg, Julian E Spring 2022
This course examines three infamously influential intellectuals—Karl Marx, Friedrich Nietzsche, and Sigmund Freud. All three are celebrated figures in the “hermeneutics of suspicion”—the traditions of emancipatory critical thought that have indelibly marked the world since the mid-nineteenth century. In addition to reconstructing these thinkers’ basic projects within their historical contexts, we will investigate their long-term influences and assess their unmitigated relevance and resonance today.

A Hard Class with Difficult Books Bourg, Julian E Spring 2022
If you made it from the course title to this description, then you are curious. And if you are an inquisitive person, then you should take this class: a history of ideas based on some of the most important and influential writings of all time, such as William Shakespeare’s Macbeth, Matthew Arnold’s Culture and Anarchy, George Orwell’s 1984, Aime Cesaire’s Discourse on Colonialism, and Richard Hofstadter’s Anti-Intellectualism in American Life. We will read serious books closely, discuss them deeply, and connect them to our lives. Are you up for the challenge? What else is college for?

The Inquisition in Spain and Spanish America Sellers-Garcia, Sylvia M Spring 2022
This lecture and discussion course for advanced students will consider the development of the Spanish Inquisition from its medieval roots to its early nineteenth-century demise. Divided roughly between Spain and the Americas, we will consider the following topics: the medieval co-existence of Jews, Muslims, and Christians in Spain; the “re-conquest” of the Iberian peninsula in the sixteenth century and the formation of the inquisition; the theological debates of the sixteenth century that determined the scope of heresy. Our focus will be on using the Inquisition as an insight into early modern culture in both Spain and the Americas.

Domestic Revolutions: Gender, Family, and Childhood in U.S. History Johnson, Marilyn Spring 2022
Family life and “family values” lay at the heart of many contemporary social and political debates. But family life in the U.S. has never fit static notions of the “traditional” American family. In fact, marriage, family, and childhood have undergone dramatic changes over the past three centuries. This course explores the changing structure, dynamics, and ideology of American family life from the early nineteenth century to the present. In exploring this history, we’ll look cross-culturally at the experience of immigrant, black, working class, and LGBTQ families. Students will conduct a final project based on genealogical and historical research into their own family history.

Ghana and the U.S.: Historical and Cultural Connections Miller, Karen Spring 2022 The course examines selected historical and cultural intersections between Ghana, West Africa, and the United States. We explore "African" and "American" components of African American identity through course readings, film, and lectures that focus on four connected areas: slavery/slave trade, civil rights/independence movements, emigration/emigration, and identity/cultural exchange. Ghana is uniquely situated for such comparative study because of its recurring presence in the unfolding of African American history, including its roles as inspiration to Martin Luther King, home to scholar W.E.B. DuBois, haven to African American emigrants, and producer of the kente cloth many wear.

American Madness: History of Mental Illness in the United States DEPT Spring 2022 This course explores the history of mental illness in America from the colonial era to the late twentieth century. It examines how ideas about mental illness changed over time; how it was understood by medical professions and laypeople; how ideas about mental illness reflected larger social beliefs about race, gender, and class; and how various strategies for curing mental disease or dealing with the mentally ill have evolved. Topics include: humanitarian reform and the nineteenth-century asylum movement; the history of somatic-based treatments such as hydrotherapy, electroshock treatment, and lobotomy; psychoanalysis; and deinstitutionalization and the community mental health care movement.

American Culture: History of Museums Burwick, Richard Spring 2022 In this course we will discuss the history and the politics of museums. Our topic will be the formation of modern museums from private collections, eclectic and arcane "Wunderkammern" of the early modern period, 19th century national museums, to the contemporary museums and exhibits. This includes not only what people decided to collect and display, but how people choose to curate displays as expression of cultural and national identity. We also investigate architecture, location, and other relevant special contexts in and around museums. We will discuss both art and natural history museums by focusing on changes in architecture and philosophy of display. We will read Thomas Bernhard's novel Old Masters as well as ancillary texts to gain a better understanding of the development of modern museums and the politics that shaped them.

Remembering a Day in History: Bloody Sunday, Northern Ireland 1972-2022 Beiner, Guy Spring 2022 On 30 January 1972, a British paratrooper unit opened fire on a protest march for civil rights in Derry/Londonderry. The events of that fatal day became a foundational moment for the Northern Irish conflict and their repercussions continued to reverberate over the following fifty years. This course offers a multi-perspective "cubist" exploration of the charged history and memory of "Bloody Sunday" and its many meanings by examining a range of sources, including state documents, legal reports, media reportage, photography, personal testimonies, poetry, songs, fiction, drama, film, visual art, artefacts and commemorative practices.

Medieval Ireland O'Hara, Alexander Spring 2022 This course will mainly focus on Early Christian Ireland from Late Antiquity to approximately 1200. It will also address the Irish in Britain and continental Europe. It will explore the development of the early Irish diaspora in Britain and Europe and consider how foreign authors wrote about Ireland in Antiquity before moving on to Ireland in the fifth century. The course will use a variety of the writings including St Patrick, Columbanus of Bobbio and Columba of Iona, the Book of Kells and end with Gerald of Wales.

18th century Ireland The Age of Protestant Ascendancy Kelly, James J Spring 2022 This seminar will examine the age of Protestant ascendancy in Ireland in context. It will explore and analyze the exercise of Protestant power between the military triumph of 1689-91 and the early nineteenth Century. It will address the challenges posed by the emergence of a politically and demographically energized Catholic population led by Daniel O'Connell. The course also engages closely with the economic and social history of the period.

Colloquium: Law and History Pendias, Devin O
Spring 2022
A range of modern thinkers and scholars, notably Hannah Arendt, Jean-Paul Sartre, as well as Gavin Langmuir have explored the history of Jew-hatred in an attempt to fathom its causes, continuities, and discontinuities. This course will examine their writings as well as other works in order to understand the religious, social, economic, psychological, and political reasons that have been suggested as sources of the phenomenon.

Graduate Seminar: U.S. since 1900 Johnson, Marilynn
Spring 2022
This seminar will explore selected topics in the political, social, and cultural history of the United States in the twentieth century. We will also investigate the types of sources, archives, and methodologies employed by twentieth century historians. Over the course of the semester, students will pursue in-depth research projects on a topic of their choosing using extensive primary and secondary source materials. The final product should be a substantial scholarly paper suitable for presentation at a professional conference or submission for publication in a scholarly journal.

HIST827501
Capstone: Digital Humanities as Public Scholarship Lehman, Brittany; Naglak, Matthew
Spring 2022
Many schools across the United States teach different versions of survey classes for which instructors have to reach outside their own focuses. To do so, those instructors often search for visualizations of historical change, literary development, and examinations of religious networks, depending on the field and course. In this capstone, graduate students will develop projects within their areas of specializations to produce digestible digital exhibits, visualizations, and more that can be made freely available to scholars across the world. The goal would be to promote the free exchange of high quality information and digital sources available in the public domain. Furthermore, through the capstone, students should understand the process of a project from conception to presentation. They should have developed skills engaging metadata, transcription, the process of digitization, and more. Students can bring their own research data from their dissertation project or from previous coursework, or they can be provided with a historical or literary dataset from the Boston College Libraries to utilize over the semester. There are four phases to the class, beginning with performing an environmental scan and writing a proposal for their project. In Phase II and III, students will implement and carry out their projects. Finally in Phase IV, students will engage in peer consulting and prepare their work for online publication.

Intermediate Italian II Santini, Jessica
Spring 2022 Conducted in Italian
Students will learn cutting edge technology and contribute to an interactive website (Commedia! Italian Renaissance Comedy). The first part of the course focuses on the Decameron by Giovanni Boccaccio, the model for Italian prose and source of the witty dialogue of Renaissance comedies. Students will then study comedies written and produced in Siena and Florence in the first half of the sixteenth century. After reading the comedies, a common list of theatergrams, or comic stock pieces, will be developed. Students will be invited to transcribe a comedy and encode the theatergrams for their final project. Training will be provided. Conducted in Italian

ITAL555501
Italian Culture Through Popular Song O'Connor, Brian R
Spring 2022
Music has the power to reflect the spirit of a nation and its people; the influences from without and the history within. This course will investigate these phenomena through the mirror of the Italian popular song, from the XIX century to the present. Along the way, we'll listen to and learn about the cancione napoletana, the insulated and nationalistic music of the Fascist regime, the great artists of the Boom years, the cantautori and music of social upheaval of the 60's and 70's, and the fragmented musical scene of today's Italy. We will also focus on development of language proficiency, both oral and written, through analysis of lyrics, cultural readings, conversation in class, creative composition, and... maybe even some singing! The course is designed for students who have completed ITAL2214ItalianConversation, Composition and Reading, but may be taken simultaneously with that course. Notes: This is a new course. It is an elective, open to majors, minors, and anyone who took CRRI and CRRII.

Italy on Stage: A Survey of Italian Theater Bassanese, Fiora A
Spring 2022
Conducted in Italian. This course will explore significant moments in the rich history of Italian theater from its origins on the medieval stage to the contemporary comedy of Nobel laureate Dario Fo. Along the way we will examine the influence of classical antiquity in the Renaissance, the Venetian comedy of Goldoni, the warring egos of Alfieri's tragedies, the high drama of Romanticism and grand opera, and the earthy verismo of Verga. We will conclude with the great international successes of Pirandello and one or two additional modern dramatists. Our study of the texts will be accompanied by a viewing of videotaped performances. This course is open to both qualified undergraduates and graduate students and counts as an elective towards the Italian major and minor.

ITAL882501
Italian Novel of the Novecento Aceto, Mattia
Spring 2022
Conducted in Italian
Open to undergraduates with permission of instructor. The novel is arguably the primary literary form of the Twentieth Century. Italy offered a unique path of experimentation and exploration in this genre, with the psychoanalytical works of Italo Svevo, the magic realism of Dino Buzzati, and the historical works of Elsa Morante, up to the revolution of experimental form led by Italo Calvino. This course analyzes the evolution of the Italian novel, from the late 1900s to the end of the last century, offering a new understanding of this genre through a comparative, interdisciplinary and trans-historical perspective.

Summer 2021
This course will seek to provide an intellectual and analytical-driven framework around the question of food as an integral part of any human experience, but particularly our experience with food through across cultures. We each have a unique opportunity to understand how the role of food in each of our lives as we move through this summer program by examining our own cultural and political assumptions and those of others from a new point of view. We can appreciate the lenses brought by other individuals, cultures and places to the acts of eating and producing food. Finally, we can express the human experience of food in ways that represent our understandings, experiences and vision for a healthy, just and pleasurable relationship to food in ways that can be shared and appreciated by others. In eating and producing food, we exist simultaneously in a deeply personal and communal place, a place of the present, past and future in which we are never more and less than human.

Restricted for rising sophomores (class of 2025) for AY 2021-2022 One of two Where on Earth? courses that introduce International Studies majors to the foundational concepts that illuminate today’s world. Taking a cultural and political geography perspective, the course explores topics including borders, development, urbanization, and the Anthropocene, as well as the key role of place in connecting our world. The course also has a digital geo-humanities lab component. We will learn to use digital tools including ArcGIS Online to create maps and storytelling tools. These tools also further our cartographic literacy and promote a critical understanding of how digital tools shape how we view global issues.

Comparative Politics of Populism and Migration in Europe Molles, Ellitsa V Fall 2021
Have all European politics and societies become liberal after post-communist transitions? How have populist parties across the Continent transformed discourses, politics, and individual identities? How do race and exclusion of ethnic, religious, or other minorities figure into Europeans’ everyday lives? How has migration uprooted social realities across Europe? The course will answer these questions and more through the lens of identity politics. It will trace and analyze the multiple transformations in Western and Eastern European politics and societies in the contemporary period, through a mix of theoretical texts, current case studies, and non-academic sources.

Religion and Contemporary Terrorism DEPT Fall 2021
Since 9/11 there has been a radical increase in attention to what is casually referred to as religious terrorism. In most cases, the phrase is used to refer to the Islamist terrorism of non-state actors (e.g., Al Qaeda, ISIS, and Boko Haram), but there are other cases (e.g., Anders Breivik’s counterjihad violence and Hezbollah’s anti-Israeli violence) that might also fit the label. This course examines the relationship between religion and contemporary terrorism by looking at a wide variety of cases and asking: Why do we describe some terrorism as religious? How can we meaningfully separate religious terrorism from secular terrorism? Does it matter if we do so? How do stereotypes about religion and race influence our understanding of these movements and events? And do we even need to talk about religion in order to understand these cases?

Is All Commerce Capitalism? Global Histories of Production, Exchange, and Power Kent, Stacie A Fall 2021
Fullfills the LAMA Requirement for History Majors Adam Smith famously wrote of “a certain propensity in human nature...to truck, barter, and exchange." Less than a century later Karl Marx observed that capitalism "cannot exist without constantly revolutionizing...the whole relations of society." This course examines both these propositions, asking what role exchange has played in human societies and in what sense capitalism is revolutionary. We study a global range of ancient, medieval, and modern trade networks, modes of production, and social meanings in and around exchange. We investigate connections trade fostered and where power inhered in the production, distribution, and consumption of goods.

INTL52101 International Law DEPT Fall 2021
This course examines the role of international public law (the "law of nations") in the world today. It takes as its starting point the academic (and practical) debate about the utility of international law in world politics. From there, we consider the philosophical foundations of law, the sources of international law, and the application of international law in different arenas. In particular, the course will focus on how international law deals with a number of issues, including the connection between domestic and international law and the laws on territory, jurisdiction, human rights, and security, as well as other relevant topics.

Curious about what international studies could look like in the future? This research methods class begins with questions: what is the possible scope of global studies? What could be its topics, methods, and questions? Rather than learn pre-established research methodologies, students will explore what research into global issues can look like. Taught by a historian, students will read texts from history and anthropology. They will learn how to identify research problems and design methodologies to answer those questions. Students interested in the senior thesis option are particularly encouraged, as the course will provide the opportunity to do preparatory work.

Spring 2022
This course explores Korea’s experience under Japanese colonial rule (1910-1945) as well as how this experience was remembered and represented in the post-colonial era. Students will explore the three phases of Japanese rule: military rule (1910-1919); cultural rule (1919-1931), and wartime mobilization (1931-1945) and how each of these phases have shaped and continue to shape Korean national identity and politics, socioeconomic development, and memory culture. The course draws on historical and literary texts as well as film and other visual sources. This course combines lecture with active student discussion and presentations.

Development and Social Justice in Korea Hwang, Ingu
Spring 2022
This course introduces students to the political and economic changes that South Korea experienced from the 1960s to the present and explores how these changes contributed to social unrest, to demands for greater democracy, and to other social justice issues. In doing so, it will address how South Korea's economic and political trajectory was informed by pressures at the international, national, and sub-national level and compare the South Korean case to that of other Asian nations.

Iranian Revolution and its Aftermath Kadivar, Mohammad Ali
Spring 2022
In the span of a decade from 1977 to 1988, Iranians first participated in one of the major social revolutions of modern history and then after that the Iraqi invasion in 1981, Iran engaged in the longest inter-state war of the 20th century. Why did the revolution happen in Iran? What was the connection between war and revolution? What are the consequences of the revolution and war for politics, society, and economy in Iran, and how have Iranian politics and society transformed since 1979 in Iran? These are some of the major questions that we try to answer through this course. Through case studies of Iranian revolution and then Iran-Iraq war, we also study main theories of revolution and war and the legacies of these most dramatic political events for post-revolutionary and post-war societies. We specifically examine the birth of the Islamic Republic out of the revolution and war and also major episodes of protest and social movements in the Islamic republic.

International Law Nakazato, Hiroshi Spring 2022
This course examines the role of the international public law (the "law of nations") in the world today. It takes as its starting point the academic (and practical) debate about the utility of international law in world politics. From there, we consider the philosophical foundations of law, the sources of international law, and the application of international law in different arenas. In particular, the course will focus on how international law deals with a number of issues, including the connection between domestic and international law and the laws on territory, jurisdiction, human rights, and security, as well as other relevant topics.

Korean War: Conflict, Security, and Peace Hwang, Ingu Spring 2022
The Korean War (1950-1953) began as a civil war but became a global conflict against the backdrop of the emerging Cold War era. Known as “the Forgotten War” in the U.S., this conflict resulted in 5 million deaths and left an indelible imprint on the world. Seven decades later the Korean peninsula remains divided, and the contentious international security mechanisms engendered by this conflict still shape East Asian relations and U.S. foreign policy. Through engagement with recent historical works, this seminar course will explore the origins and legacies of this conflict, security options and limitations, and conditions and visions of peace.

Global Political Catholicism Gallagher, Charles R Spring 2022
This class asks the question, “What has led to the creation and historical persistence of Catholic mass politics?” It begins its historical perspective in modernity, anchored by the publication of the social encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891) and ending with Catholic policy in the Obama Administration. We will look at how political parties, movements, and theologians interacted with the Vatican and the wider church. The European Church’s phenomenon of “clerico-fascism” during the World War II era will be investigated. Regionally, we will look at how Catholicism has shaped political activism in China, Latin America, Europe, and the United States.

Drugs and Money Knet, Stacie A Spring 2022
Fulfills the LAMA Requirement for History Majors. Amidst the current U.S. opioid epidemic, this course investigates how the pursuit of profit has intersected with constructions of health, illness, and social vice. Where and how have states and societies supported or tolerated widespread narcotic use? By the same token, what social, economic, and political processes transform use into social shame or criminal behavior? The course will look at the centuries-long opium trade between British India and China, the early history of commercial opium around the world, and compare two U.S. epidemics in their global and local dimensions crack cocaine in the 1980s and opioids in the 2000s.

Edifying Books on the Arab-Israeli Conflict Salameh, Franck Spring 2022
With the aim of gaining a deeper understanding of the antagonisms riving and riveting Arab and Jew, this course seeks to discuss edifying books on the Arab-Israeli conflict, analyzing their themes, probing their authors voices, examining temperaments, opinions, political engagements, and attitudes of self and other, and each of the actors/authors'atives. The course will embark with a critical historical analysis of what is colloquially known as the Arab-Israeli conflict, bringing special attention to splintering empires Post-WWI (both in the Middle East and Europe,) delving into the complex unresolved legacies of multiple identities and the political and cultural conflicts that accompanied the emergence of a new Middle Eastern state system. The course will then proceed to the analysis of various narrative voices of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, interrogating key concepts such as identity, memory, state, homeland, nationalism, localism, diaspora, Zionism, Arabism, refugees, and citizenship from different Arab and Israeli purviews four Arab and four Israeli voices in total, all eight of which by definition advancing heated, temperamental, personal, seldom unbiased voices. The course will conclude with students selecting one additional book, as part of their Final Paper topic and class presentation, which they will read independently summarizing their books narrative and its authors voice and positionality (that is to say, how the authors identity and world of references inform his/her biases, beliefs, and attitudes relative to the Arab-Israeli conflict.)

Jesuit Studies Courses: Summer 2021

JESU715701
In the Footsteps of Leaders Beaumier, Casey
Summer 2021
This course considers the distinctive methods of Jesuit leadership by situating them in their historical and geographic context. The course begins with ten days of experiential learning in Spain and Rome where students immerse themselves in the key places that became the roots of the Society of Jesus using primary sources to critically examine the decisions and actions of the early Jesuits. The course continues at Boston College with lectures, discussions, and case-study analyses moderated by distinguished leaders of Jesuit apostolates. Students will consider contemporary topics such as the challenges and opportunities experienced by administrators and teachers at secondary and higher-education schools. Coursework features selected readings, workshops, and projects to be completed in small groups. Through this course, students will gain an understanding of the Jesuits' early vision of leadership and of the ways that vision has both changed and remained constant.

Jesuit Pedagogy Casalini, Cristiano Spring 2022
This is an online course. This three-credit, graduate-level online course examines the distinctiveness of the Jesuits’ approaches to teaching and of their philosophy of education that have propelled their schools to unprecedented success over the centuries. One key to the unprecedented success of Jesuit education has been the tension between the recognizable mark of uniformity that long distinguished the methods, contents, and practices of Jesuit schools and their ability to adapt to different contexts and times. Both aspects—the uniformity and the adaptability—were explicitly supported by the "Ratio studiorum," the Jesuits’ foundational plan of studies issued in 1599, which, despite the schools’ many variations and complexities, has retained some influence over time. With the "Ratio" discarded, Jesuit schools had to clarify what made them distinctively Jesuit, reconciling their mission with the contemporary world. This three-credit, graduate-level class sketches the developments of Jesuit educational endeavors by focusing on both the permanent and changing traits of its distinctive pedagogy.

Social Justice in Jesuit Contexts Casalini, Cristiano
Fall 2021
This is a Graduate-level on-line course. The Social Apostolate of the Society of Jesus has developed in a variety of ways over the centuries according the diverse contexts where Jesuits have operated as agents of "social justice." This class offers students both a broad and deep understanding of: (1) How the Society of Jesus developed its mission in support of creating a "preferential option for the poor"; (2) How the Society understood its role to promote liberation from oppression in diverse social environments; (3) What kind of services have been activated by the Society of Jesus in order to fulfill its core values of "the service of faith and promotion of justice"; and (4) How social justice is pursued through pedagogy and practices by Jesuit and Ignatian schools today, given the significant involvement of the Jesuits with formal education on a global scale. The course is designed to foster deep and meaningful conversation among students. It will include individual and collective readings and video-conferences with leaders and teachers of Jesuit schools around the world, deepening students' knowledge of current practices and stimulating dialogue.

Discernment and Prayer in the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius Geger, Barton T
Spring 2022
This is a Graduate level online course. A study of the spiritual doctrine of St. Ignatius Loyola as articulated in the text of the Spiritual Exercises, but with reference to other texts such as Ignatius’ Testament, letters, and the Constitutions of the Society of Jesus. The focus is how Ignatius’ treatment of prayer, discernment of spirits, and discernment of God’s will, work together to form a “contemplative in action.”

JOUR225501
Writing Narrative Journalism O’Connor, John Fall 2021
Note to Journalism minors only: this course satisfies the requirement for an elective with a "craft" orientation. "Artificial Paradoxes": In his 1860 book Les Paradis Artificiels (Artificial Paradises) Baudeelaire’s principal concern is the physical, moral, and psychological effects of hashish. But in a broader sense, the work is also an investigation into the connections between the needs of the body and the hungers of the soul. There can be good uses for vices, Baudeelaire seems to be saying—warm, to illuminate, to ease suffering—and they can reveal our deepest beliefs about who we are, or about the kind of person we imagine ourselves to be. In this class, "vice" can mean anything from the sins Thomas Aquinas enumerated in Summa Theologica—pride, envy, anger, lust, sloth, gluttony, avarice (plus despair)—to the over-application of Prudentius’s seven virtues of kindness, patience, charity, humility, temperance, diligence, and charity. And yes, it can also mean the kinds of things you might read about in Vice magazine. But this is emphatically not a class for you to write about your vision quest to Joshua Tree or a lost spring break in Cabo. Its aim instead is to show students effective ways to employ vice in journalistic work, to write intelligently about the many-sided imperatives of passion and pleasure, and to develop clear, informed opinions about the subject. Students will submit four original pieces of writing during the semester. Readings will include works by Hunter S. Thompson, Joan Didion, Machado de Assis, Chris Kraus, Chester Himes, Pauline Reage, and others.

Ground Truth Sennott, Charles Fall 2021
Note to Journalism minors: this course satisfies the requirement for an elective with a "critical" orientation.

A term borrowed from digital mapping, ground truth argues that reporting from the ground up is a journalists highest calling. This course first explores the idea of truth, from ancient Greece and great theologians to contemporary writers. We will then examine the rise of national leaders around the world weaponizing doubt; how discernible facts and the truth itself have come under attack and; and how news organizations can best live up to Edward R Murrow’s admonishment to serve without fear or favor. The course will introduce students to an international survey of ground-level reporting that focuses on the role of the journalist as a witness who speaks truth to power.

Note to Journalism minors: this course satisfies the requirement for an elective with a craft" orientation." The rise of the internet as a news delivery system has changed the face of the news business, for better or worse, in the twenty-first century. This one semester seminar will trace the history of new media's relationship with journalism while preparing students for the leaner online world. Students will learn about practical matters (storytelling for the web, condensing complex narratives into 140-character missives) while grappling with larger concerns affecting the industry and readers (traffic-based journalism, slippery sourcing) as they report and write on the world around them.

Writing About Popular Music Johnston, Maura K Spring 2022
Note to Journalism minors: this course satisfies the requirement for an elective with a craft" orientation." Reporting on popular music is a keenly effective way to take a snapshot of culture as it's happening. In this discussion-intensive class, students will get hands-on tips on how to write about music effectively, hone their critical thinking skills, and examine the ways that the business struggles experienced by both music and publishing have affected the way pop writing is disseminated and consumed. Guest speakers from the music writing world will provide further insights on their career paths, their views on where music is now, and the artists and songs that stole their passion.

Writing Narrative Journalism O'Connor, John Spring 2022
Note to Journalism minors only: this course satisfies the requirement for an elective with "craft" orientation. "Artificial Paradises". In his 1860 book Les Paradis Artificialis (Artificial Paradises) Baudeau's principal concern is the physical, moral, and psychological effects of hashish. But in a broader sense, the work is also an investigation of the kind of person we imagine ourselves to be. In this class, "vice" can mean anything from the sins Thomas Aquinas enumerated in Summa Theologiae--pride, envy, anger, lust, sloth, gluttony, avarice (plus despair)--to the over-application of Prudentius's seven virtues of kindness, patience, chastity, humility, temperance, diligence, and charity. And yes, it can also mean the kinds of things you might read about in Vice magazine. But this is emphatically not a class for you to write about your vision quest to Joshua Tree or a lost spring break in Cabo. Its aim instead is to show students effective ways to employ voice in journalistic work, to write intelligently about the many-sided imnneratives of passion and pleasure, and to develop clear, informed opinions about the subject. Students will submit four original pieces of writing during the semester. Readings will include works by Hunter S. Thompson, Joan Didion, Machado de Assis, Chris Kraus, Chester Himes, Pauline Reage, and others.

Linguistics Courses: Fall 2021

General Linguistics Owusu, Augustina Fall 2021
An introduction to linguistics the scientific study of human language and contemporary linguistic theory. Linguists use mathematical systems (often called formal systems) to develop precise theories that help us understand the rich cognitive processes that support our use of language to communicate, to conduct internal monologues, and much more. The course focuses on the major subfields within linguistics: phonetics, phonology, morphology, syntax, and semantics: how do linguists create and manipulate representations of language phenomena, and how do they analyze linguistic data? Our primary data will be from English, but we will also employ data from other languages. No previous exposure to the field is presupposed.

MATH110110
Calculus II, Hongyi Fall 2021
MATH1101 is not open to students who have completed MATH1103 or MATH1105. Students contemplating majors in Chemistry, Computer Science/B.S., Environmental Geosciences, Geological Sciences, Mathematics or Physics should enroll in either MATH1103 (Spring) or MATH1105 (Fall). For further information about selecting your Math courses given your background, please see this link to the BC Math Department. MATH1101 is a second course in the calculus of one variable intended for biology, computer science, economics, management, and premedical students. It is open to others who are qualified and desire a more rigorous mathematics course at the core level. Topics include an overview of integration, basic techniques for integration, a variety of applications of integration, and an introduction to (systems of) differential equations.

Mathematical Modeling Garvey, Paul R
Fall 2021
This course introduces students to methods of mathematical modeling. The emphasis is on ways to analytically represent and study today's complex modeling problems, with cases from the natural and social sciences. Topics include the model building process, mathematical models of systems, and modeling data to discover properties and hidden characteristics. The calculus of finite differences and solutions to classes of difference equations will serve as the core mathematical theory taught in this course. The dynamics of certain linear and nonlinear models will be explored from various domains (e.g., population models, economic models, Markov models). The course will conclude with an introduction to mathematical graph theory and its application to modeling interacting and interdependent systems and networks.

History of Mathematics DEPT
Fall 2021
This course studies the development of mathematical thought, from ancient times to the twentieth century. Naturally, the subject is much too large for a single semester, so we will concentrate on the major themes and on the contributions of the greatest mathematicians. The emphasis in the course will be on the mathematics. Students will follow the historical arguments and work with the tools and techniques of the period being studied.

Calculus II, Godoy, Miguel A Spring 2022
MATH1101 is not open to students who have completed MATH1103 or MATH1105. Students contemplating majors in Chemistry, Computer Science/B.S., Environmental Geosciences, Geological Sciences, Mathematics or Physics should enroll in either MATH1103 (Spring) or MATH1105 (Fall). For further information about selecting your Math courses given your background, please see this link to the BC Math Department. MATH1101 is a second course in the calculus of one variable intended for biology, computer science, economics, management, and premedical students. It is open to others who are qualified and desire a more rigorous mathematics course at the core level. Topics include an overview of integration, basic techniques for integration, a variety of applications of integration, and an introduction to (systems of) differential equations.

MUSA109001
Ear Training/Sight-Singing Lab Burgo, Michael
Fall 2021
For music majors. In meetings twice a week students learn to sing melodies by sight through a solfege system of drilling scales and intervals (sight-singing) and learn to notate melodic, rhythmic, and harmonic patterns (ear-training). The course principally helps students pass the Ear Training/Sight Singing requirement for the major but can benefit individuals in singing groups or those who wish to improve their practical musical skills. Preference given to majors & minors. Usually taken concurrently with MUSA 2100 Harmony or MUSA 3100 Chromatic Harmony.

Fundamentals of Music Theory Gawlick, Barbara S
Fall 2021
An introductory music theory course designed for students with a strong interest in music. As a Core course it includes speculations on how musical discourse informs our perception and understanding of the world around us. Students learn to acquire skills in music notation and transcription. The following theoretical concepts will be extensively covered: notation of pitch and rhythm, scales, intervals, chords, and harmonic progression. Students leave the course prepared for upper level study in music theory and will begin to question broader issues concerning the meaning and use of music. Training in Keyboard Skills is required in the accompanying Lab.

Music of the Classic Period McGann, Jeremiah W
Fall 2021
This course will consider the musical trends of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries (c. 1750- c. 1815) that are characterized by the movement towards simplicity in melody and a clarification of harmonic language. While music that served as a transitional style from the Baroque period will be the starting point for this course, in large measure, the focus of the course will be on the music of the two great composers who lived and worked in or around Vienna in the period 1780-1800: Haydn and Mozart. Fulfills Music Period course in Major and Minor.

Musics of Asia Dineen, Douglass Fall 2021
This course offers an approach to Asian culture focusing on music and the performing arts. Case studies from India, Tibet, China, Japan, Korea, and Indonesia highlight the profound richness of musical experience seen throughout Asia while providing the foundation for a broader analysis of music-as-culture. Examining how music is deployed--in religious expression, political and social strategies, identity formation, and entertainment--reveals both continuities in musical uses/meanings and diversity in its cultural, social, and personal dimensions. This course locates contemporary Asian performing arts in their historical contexts, considers the transformations that take place as music flows across borders, and examines the interplay between global information networks and local forms and representations.

The Music Industry James, Donald J
This course examines the music industry -broadly considered- from song publishing in the eighteenth century through the streaming era today. Taking a historical approach, we will place special emphasis on creative and cultural labor and the ways in which those who create and produce music have negotiated transformation in media, technology, and business. While our focus will be primarily on the US popular music industry, we will periodically consider industry in the Western classical tradition and world musics. Topics will include song publishing, copyright, performance rights, labor unions, the record industry, social networks, and streaming platforms.

In this course we will study the fundamentals of two- and three-part polyphonic styles. Using the principles of species counterpoint, we will acquire a dependable contrapuntal technique to write short compositions, first in two parts and eventually in three. Assignments will include short works in free imitation, strict canon, and invertible counterpoint. Our studies will include a brief survey of the historical origins of Western polyphony and analysis of contrapuntal compositions of the Baroque period.

Music Academic Courses: Spring 2022
MUSA109001
Ear Training/Sight-Singing Lab Burgo, Michael
Spring 2022
For music majors. In meetings twice a week students learn to sing melodies by sight through a solfeggio system of drilling scales and intervals (sight-singing) and learn to notate melodic, rhythmic, and harmonic patterns (ear-training). The course principally helps students pass the Ear Training/Sight Singing requirement for the major but can benefit individuals in singing groups or those who wish to improve their practical musical skills. Prefered for music majors & minors. Usually taken concurrently with MUSA 2100 Harmony or MUSA 3100 Chromatic Harmony.

Education Through Music Gawlick, Barbara S Spring 2022
This is a course in general education, especially appropriate for majors and minors in education and music. The objectives of this course are to equip prospective teachers with strategies and methods of teaching and integrating music within the Prek -12 curriculum and to develop basic music competencies and understanding to engage a student's artistic, emotional, cognitive, physical, and psychological faculties. These objectives will be addressed through a variety of experiences: assigned readings, writings and research projects on topics of music philosophy and aesthetics, theories of children's musical development/learning, teaching methodologies and materials, hands-on activities, and in-class teaching opportunities.

Afro-Brazilian Musical Worlds Dineen, Douglass Spring 2022
This course will take students on a deep dive into the rich worlds of Afro-Brazilian music and culture. Unpacking quintessentially Brazilian forms, such as samba and bossa nova, we will discover a complex (and sometimes uncomfortable) combination of African- and European/American-derived elements. Next, we will home in on the music of Candomblé. In this Afro-Brazilian religious form, students will discover direct sonic and cultural connections to African practices and trace close links to other communities in the African diaspora. We will also focus on capoeira, a Brazilian art combining music, dance, and martial arts, and on the muscis of carnival in Bahia—the source and center of Afro-Brazilian culture. Throughout the semester, we will consider music's roles in identity formation, in the making of national stories, and in social and cultural resistance to those narratives. Students will experience Afro-Brazilian music culture through listening, study, and embodied engagement (i.e., music making and moving to it). There are no academic or music-skills prerequisites for this course.

Music in the Medieval Islamic World Lucas, Ann E
Spring 2022
This course examines the nature of music in the medieval Islamic world and its relationships with cultural factors that shaped the history of the Arabic, Persian, and Turkish speaking worlds after the rise of Islam. The course will cover a period of history from the rise of the Ummayad Caliphate (c. 660), through the Perso-Islamic empires of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries. Some aspects of music under the Safavid and Moghul Empires during the sixteenth century will also be addressed. Topics covered in this course include: the place of music in the context of Islamic philosophy, the function of music within the Islamic Caliphate, the use of music in Islamic mysticism and musical changes that occurred in response to the changing nature of Islamic Empire.

Students enrolled in this course will complete three composition projects: (1) a three-part fugue in the Baroque style of J.S. Bach, (2) a Sonata-Allegro first movement in the Classical style of Haydn or Mozart, and (3) a Rondo or Scherzo movement in the Romantic style of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, or Schumann. We will examine representative works of these composers in these genres to serve as models for the student compositions.

Dance to the Music: Choreomusicality from the Baroque Court to YouTube Callahan, Daniel Spring 2022
This course will explore the changing relationships between music and dance on street, stage, and screen from the seventeenth century up to the present. We will consider a range of interrelated topics such as music and dance as text (score, orchesography, choreography) versus as performance and/or improvisation, the performance of power and of identity (race, gender, sexuality, class), spectacle and the gaze, audiovisual synchronicity, film, modernism and the avant-garde, and popular culture. Case studies will be drawn from Baroque dance, ballet, tap, modern dance, hip-hop, and the contemporary music video. Students will share weekly responses with their peers, write a paper on a live performance they attend together, and complete a final research paper and presentation.

Beethoven McGrann, Jeremiah W Spring 2022
An introduction to Ludwig van Beethoven (1770-1827), tracing his intellectual development within the culture and society of the Rhenish Enlightenment, his musical enrichment of the High Classicism of Mozart and Haydn (among others), and the heroic style of his best known works to his feelings and expressions of musical and social isolation in his last years, and his problematic identity with the burgeoning romantic movement in Germany. Emphasis will be on the music itself, concentrating on compositions from three genres: piano sonata, string quartet, and symphony. Also covered will be the concerto, his opera Fidelio, and the Missa Solemnis.

The Beatles: From "Yesterday" to "Tomorrow Never Knows" James, Donald J Spring 2022
Restricted to Music Majors and Minors only. Everyone loves the Beatles. In this class, we explore why that is the case. We will chart the rapidly changing idiom of popular music in the 1960s and outline its interaction with various social, political, and cultural movements, such as "Beatlemania" and psychedelia. The primary source material for this class is the established canon of Beatles songs, albums, and films, which we will supplement with secondary articles, reviews, and interviews. This course will challenge you to listen critically to, and think deeply about, one of the most influential bands in the twentieth century.

Waaw Waaw BC
Mangin, Timothy R;Toure, Amadou I Fall 2021

This course specializes in sabar, a drumming and dance style of the Wolof people from Senegal. Performed in many contexts, the sabar is heard at baptisms, weddings, wrestling matches, political and community gatherings, the Black Panther soundtrack, and the urban dance music called mbalax. Students will learn the repertoire performed at these events in weekly classes taught by A. Lamine Toure, a master drummer from one of the oldest griot families. We welcome musicians, non-musicians, students, faculty, staff, African music fans, and members of the Boston community. We provide the drums. The ensemble is inspired by the Wolof expression "waaw waaw," a positive affirmation meaning "Yes!!!", "That's Right," Good Job, and "Excellent." Our classes encourage collective participation, fun, and a deeper understanding of a millennia-old drumming tradition that continues to evolve as new technologies and musical styles emerge.

Edifying Books on the Arab-Israeli Conflict Salameh, Franck
Spring 2022
With the aim of gaining a deeper understanding of the antagonisms riving and riveting Arab and Jew, this course seeks to discuss edifying books on the Arab-Israeli conflict, analyzing their themes, probing their authors voices, examining temperaments, opinions, political engagements, and attitudes of self and other, and each of the actors/authors' narratives. The course will embark with a critical historical analysis of what is colloquially known as the Arab-Israeli conflict, bringing special attention to splintering empires Post-WWI (both in the Middle East and Europe,) delving into the complex unresolved legacies of multiple identities and the political and cultural conflicts that accompanied the emergence of a new Middle Eastern state system. The course will then proceed to the analysis of various narrative voices of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, interrogating key concepts such as identity, memory, state, homeland, nationalism, localism, diaspora, Zionism, Arabism, refugees, and citizenship from different Arab and Israeli purviews four Arab and four Israeli voices in total, all eight of which by definition advancing heated, temperamental, personal, seldom unbiased voices. The course will conclude with students selecting one additional book, as part of their Final Paper topic and class presentation, which they will read independently summarizing their books narrative and its authors voice and positionality (that is to say, how the authors identity and world of references inform his/her biases, beliefs, and attitudes relative to the Arab-Israeli conflict.)

PHIL116001 The Challenge of Justice Pope, Stephen J
Fall 2021
This course introduces the student to the principal understandings of justice that have developed in the Western philosophical and theological traditions. Care is taken to relate the theories to concrete, practical and political problems, and to develop good reasons for choosing one way of justice rather than another. The relationship of justice to the complementary notion of peace will also be examined. Special attention is paid to the contribution of Catholic theology in the contemporary public conversation about justice and peace. Problems discussed may include human rights, hunger and poverty, and ecological justice.

Cultural and Social Structures I Sweeney, Meghan T
Fall 2021
This course focuses on examining the cultural foundations that underlie the contemporary ways in which people choose to structure life, figuratively, and symbolically the way they live together. Our study centers on questions about how our cultural and social structures are the concrete expression in politics, city planning, architecture, literature, etc., of what we value and of the things we consider meaningful and important.

PHIL235001
Playing God: Technology and the Human Condition Storey, David E
Fall 2021
When asked whether God exists, Google futurist and inventor Ray Kurzweil, widely regarded as the prophet-par excellence of Silicon Valley, replied, "Not yet." Conventional wisdom has it that we are in the midst of a "techlash"—a backlash against the powerful and pervasive digital technologies developed in the first two decades of the twenty-first century that is sowing unintended psychological, political, and economic consequences. In this course, you will survey the philosophy of technology, including canonical figures such as Aristotle, Bacon, Martin Heidegger, and Hans Jonas—and contemporary scholars such as Hubert Dreyfus and Shannon Vallor, as well as popular authors such as Sherry Turkle and Jaron Lanier. In particular, we will explore the moral dimensions and the psychological, political, and economic consequences of digital and emerging technologies, including the internet, smart phones, social media, big data, genetic engineering, life enhancement and extension, virtual reality, and artificial intelligence.

PHIL245001
Philosophies of Happiness Davenport, Anne A
Fall 2021
How do philosophers approach happiness? Is happiness defined by well-being, pleasure, emotional state, life satisfaction, or is it best approached through some kind of hybrid account? What is, moreover, the sources of happiness? We start with the challenge of human tragedy in Shakespeare’s King Lear, drawing on Walter Kaufmann and on Stanley Cavell. We then compare and contrast Thomas More’s utopian imagination with the skepticism of Michel de Montaigne. We return to utopian imagination with Francis Bacon and compare his views to Descartes (rationalist), Hobbes (materialist), and Pascal (pragmatist), raising the question of how Faith and reason enter into happiness. We consider John’s Ray influential argument for God by design. We read Voltaire’s Candide and Emile de Chatelet’s Discourse on Happiness. We examine Diderot’s formulation of happiness and Rousseau’s contrasting view. We look at the distinctive way in which Rousseau privileges beauty and we pursue the topic of aesthetics in John Ruskin and Jane Addams. We end with Freud and Jean-Louis Chirat.

PHIL314701
Zen and Philosophy Johnson, David W Fall 2021
This course focuses on the relation between Zen Buddhism and philosophy. It introduces the basic principles and tenets of Buddhism and provides an overview of the origins and historical development of the Zen school. Because the Neo-Daoist movement influenced the reception of Buddhism in China and shaped the distinctively Chinese form of Buddhism known as Chan (Zen), we will also examine Daoist discourse and practices as these emerge from the Daodejing and the Zhuangzi. In the latter half of the course we will look at the ways in which Zen has shaped Japanese philosophy by considering the doctrines of medieval thinkers such as Dogen as well as the views of the twentieth-century philosophers Nishida Kitaro and Kimura Bin.

Inductive Logic Atkins, Richard Fall 2021
An inductive logic is a logic of evidential support. When inductive arguments are good, the premises provide a degree of support for the conclusion. In contrast, for valid deductive arguments, it is impossible for the premises to be true and yet for the conclusion to be false. Sometimes, deduction is characterized as necessary reasoning whereas induction is characterized as probable reasoning. In this course, we will examine what distinguishes deduction from induction, the varieties of inductive inference, and paradoxes that arise in inductive logic. Topics covered include inference to the best explanation, the probability calculus, Bayes’s theorem, and paradoxes such as Goodman’s riddle of induction and the paradox of the ravens.

PHIL352101
Varieties of Feeling Cohen, Martin
Fall 2021
Philosophical, literary, artistic, and religious traditions are sources for descriptions and evocations of many kinds of profound and humbly compelling feelings that are not reducible to the labeled emotions. There are, for example, feelings of guidance and direction; feelings of discernment and heart-knowing; feelings of reverence and aesthetic contemplation; and feelings of communion. Feelings often play a role in ethical decision-making, as well as in love. Between the aridity of some forms of intellectualism, on the one side, and the facile advice to trust the gut and the immediacy of whatever intuition appears, on the other, there is a powerful realm of human feeling that calls out for rigorous inquiry. To ignore this realm is to overlook one way to cultivate depths of our humanity. Great literature is often a haven for acknowledging this differentiated realm of feeling that philosophy can benefit from considering. The ancient pillars of the Western discourse on Love, Plato’s Symposium and the Biblical Song of Songs, suggest the vastness and potential goodness of feeling. The tripartite soul as conceived by Plato and Aristotle, in which the rational is assigned the task of supervising, controlling or persuading the spirited and appetitive parts, will be respectfully fathomed as a prelude to considering many refinements, qualifications and challenges to this hierarchy granting dominance to rationality. The era of Shakespeare, Cervantes and Montaigne issues one challenge; the romanticism of Wordsworth, Keats and Blake another; and a burgeoning body of philosophical and literary materials on feeling in the 20th century extends the unfolding of this formidable ancient conception. As the plurality and variety of feelings are acknowledged, how much ethics be reconceived?

Feminisms and Philosophies of Difference McGill, Cherie
What does it mean to call oneself (or someone else) a 'feminist'? In attempting an answer to this question, we will consider efforts to reveal, unravel, and remedy the conceptual, psychological, and economic dimensions of the oppression of women. We will discuss a variety of feminisms—liberal, existential, radical—and their differing approaches to such 'feminist' issues as marriage and domestic violence, reproduction and pregnancy, work and sexual harassment, and the science of gender and gender difference. We will examine the relationship of sexism to racism, heterosexism, and class exploitation, and investigate the role of the concept of difference in creating and maintaining structural inequalities.

True Fiction: From Philosophy to Literature Newmark, Kevin
Fall 2021
Beginning with Plato's allegory of the cave, this course will examine the question of truth and the way it has been addressed in several key texts, at several key moments, in the history of philosophy and of literature. What is the relation between the philosophical concept of truth and the literary modes of fiction in which that concept is often articulated? Readings will include Plato, Descartes, Kant, Kleist, Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, Kafka and Heidegger, among others.

PHIL440501

Greek Philosophy Byers, Sarah C Fall 2021
This course is organized around the central philosophical questions asked and answered by philosophers in the ancient Greek-speaking world. Topics include theories of material bodies, change and time, elemental physics, and entities and their predicates; whether anything immaterial or immutability exists and, if so, its relation to the changing cosmos; the existence and nature of God or gods; the existence and nature of the human soul and its relation to the human body; the criterion of truth and the nature of language; the criterion of ethics; theories of animal and human cognition and motivation. We will consider Plato, Aristotle, and, more briefly, some pre-Socratic and post-Aristotelian authors such as Plutarch, Epicetus, and Plotinus.

PHIL442301

Spanish-American Philosophy Gurtler, Gary
Fall 2021
This course is designed to give the student an opportunity to look at some fundamental philosophical issues regarding human nature and the origins and development of human thought from a fresh perspective. Unamuno's Tragic Sense of Life presents a critique of the rationalism of modern European thought by focusing on human life as dream, theater, and struggle. Octavio Paz, in The Labyrinth of Solitude, explores the meaning of human existence through the lens, or perhaps the mask, of the Mexican quest for identity at the end of the present century.

Freud and Philosophy Rumble, Vanessa P
Fall 2021
The course is designed to acquaint students with the scope and evolution of Freud's thinking and with significant developments in psychoanalysis since his time. Students will study and discuss Freud's and Breuer's first formulation of the nature of hysteria; Freud's groundbreaking work in dream interpretation and the nature of unconscious processes; Freud's attempt to apply his novel theory of unconscious mechanisms to cultural anthropology as well as to the individual psychology; and the implications of the ongoing revisions in Freud's classification of the drives. Above all, we will focus on Freud's attempt, over the course of many years, to account for the origin of human morality and guilt, and his ongoing assessment of the role of Judaism in his life and in his culture.

PHIL529501
Modern Philosophy Solere, Jean-Luc
Fall 2021
From the early 17th to the end of the 18th century, reason asserted its autonomy and triumphed in the Age of Enlightenment, but at the same time reflected on its own limits. Through a series of themes and problems, the course presents the major philosophies (roughly, from Descartes to Kant) that have accompanied the development of scientific knowledge, the rise of the modern mind, and the transformation of Western societies. This comprehensive survey covers metaphysics, epistemology, ethics, and political philosophy, paying attention to the interconnection between ideas in these different domains (with for instance the centrality of the notion of law: laws of nature, political laws, moral law). It particularly highlights the logical development in the succession of questions and answers that characterize the evolution of philosophy in the modern times. The course will provide you with the central concepts of modern thought, so as to grasp the bases of today understanding of the world and of ourselves. Analysis of representative texts, class discussions, and writing assignments are designed to develop rigorous argumentation and expression skills. Patristic Greek I Schatkin, Margaret
Fall 2021
This course is continued in the spring as THEOS373 New Testament Greek II. This two-semester course is designed for the student with no previous knowledge of ancient Greek to develop reading and translating skills in Patristic Greek language by mastering the fundamental principles of Greek grammar and syntax and acquiring a basic reading vocabulary. The student becomes familiar with the meaning of Greek words, their forms and structure, and their customary arrangement in sentences. A secondary goal of this course is to serve as a foundation for further studies in Patristic Greek.

Capstone: A Life Well Lived DeChiaro-Quenzer, Deborah
Fall 2021
Capstone classes may NOT be taken Pass/Fail. You may take only ONE Capstone class before graduation. Seniors only... This course engages students in serious reflection on what it means to have “a life well lived.” It is advantageous to do this reflection at this time in your life, as it affords you time and opportunity to shape your life going forward. What kind of life do you hope to live? What will bring you peace and satisfaction—dare we say, even happiness? Students will be asked to examine themselves by looking both backwards and forwards in many dimensions of their lives (education, ethics, relationships, career, etc.) while learning what others have said about having a meaningful life.

PHIL550001
Philosophy of Law
Van Rooy, Paul A
Fall 2021
This course aims to provide an overview of a number of core debates in contemporary philosophy of law. The primary concern will be to examine the question between legal validity and the moral normativity of the law, that is, answers to the question "What is the law?" and "Is there a (moral) duty to obey the law?" In addition to these more general questions, we will focus on several more specific questions pertaining to constitutionalism, including "What is the relationship between a constitution and the rule of law?", "What is the ground of judicial review?" and "What connection, if any, is there between questions of legal theory and broader debates in contemporary political philosophy?"

Medieval Christian Mystical Philosophy: Ereugena, Eckhart, Cusanus Moran, Dernmot Fall 2021
In this course, I plan to read key texts in the Christian Neoplatonic mystical tradition, focusing in particular on Johannes Scotus Ereugena (c. 800-877), Meister Eckhart of Hochheim (1260-1328), and Nicholas of Cusa (1401-1464). The class will begin with readings from St. Augustine and Dionysius the Areopagite, the two most influential figures for medieval Christian Platonism. We shall then read sections of Ereugena’s Peripheysen and Homily on the Prologue to St. John’s Gospel, selections from Eckhart’s sermons and tracts, and parts of Nicholas of Cusa’s On Learned Ignorance and De li non aliud (On God as Not Other). The course will consider the Neoplatonic context, affirmative and negative theology, and the nature of the human being in the context of the dialectics of knowledge and ignorance, immanence, and transcendence.

Philosophy and the Pedagogy of Service Byrne, Patrick;Fried, C G Fall 2021
Graduate PULSE (3 credits per semester, two semester sequence): In this two-semester course, the student will learn both the theory and practice of teaching a Philosophy service-learning course. The student will attend an undergraduate section of PULSE, doing the same readings as the undergraduates and working in a service placement for four hours a week. The student will also attend a bi-weekly seminar with other graduate students in the course and the graduate PULSE instructor, doing readings in the pedagogy of service learning, philosophy of education, and related fields. In consultation with the section instructor, the student will also serve as a writing mentor to undergraduates in the class. Requirements will include short reflection and exploratory papers, similar to the undergraduates, and a final research paper each semester.
The first semester will focus on philosophy of education and on the pedagogy of service-learning; the second semester will focus on applied philosophical issues raised by specific service placements, either in the ethics of engaged service work or on policy questions connected to the service. Enrollment requires the permission of the undergraduate section instructor, the instructor for the graduate course, and the Director of the PULSE Program.

This course introduces students to philosophical reflection and to its history through the presentation and discussion of the writings of major thinkers from ancient, medieval, modern, and contemporary periods. The course is designed to show how fundamental and enduring questions about the universe and about human beings recur in different historical contexts. Emphasis is given to ethical themes, such as the nature of the human person, the foundation of human rights and corresponding responsibilities, and the problems of social justice.

PHIL116001 The Challenge of Justice Snyder, Joshua R
Spring 2022
This course introduces the student to the principal understandings of justice that have developed in the Western philosophical and theological traditions. Care is taken to relate the theories to concrete, practical and political problems, and to develop good reasons for choosing one way of justice rather than another. The relationship of justice to the complementary notion of peace will also be examined. Special attention is paid to the contribution of Catholic theology in the contemporary public conversation about justice and peace. Problems discussed may include human rights, hunger and poverty, and ecological justice.

Perspectives on War, Aggression, and Conflict Resolution I Jackson-Meyer, Katherine A
Spring 2022
The Faith, Peace, and Justice Program at Boston College sponsors this course as an introduction to the field of Peace Studies. This course asks: Is it ever ethical to go to war? Is it possible to be ethical in war? And, what does ethical conflict resolution look like? This course investigates these questions primarily using the resources of the Christian theological tradition and the social sciences, as well as engaging with philosophy and film. Special attention will be paid to issues in contemporary warfare and the challenges and promises of peacebuilding.

PHIL324001
Towards Deep Subjectivity: Architecture, Ethics, and the Personhood of Place Braham, Brian J
Spring 2022
In Genius Loci: A Phenomenology of Architecture Christian Norberg-Schulz argues that if human beings are to dwell authentically under the sky and on the earth, the architect’s role is to provide an “existential foothold,” which grounds people’s relationship to their environment. “Man dwells when he can orientate himself with his environment and experiences it as meaningful” and thus ethical; to have an existential foothold allows one to “be” at home. To dwell means that human beings achieve an individual and communal identity—a personhood in a given place. The purpose of this course will be to explore the relationship between subjectivity, architecture, ethics, and the notion of personhood as authentic dwelling on the earth and under the sky.

PHIL440801
Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Philosophy Magri, Elisa
Spring 2022
In this course, we will explore the sources, forms, and implications of the concept of alienation, as this emerged in the nineteenth century and developed over twentieth century philosophy.
We will start, in the first part of the course, with an overview of the challenges brought about by Kant’s philosophy with particular regard to the relation between nature and freedom.
Particular attention will be given to the role of education and the re-evaluation of the finitude of human spirit in Fichte, Schiller, and Hegel. We will examine how the concept of alienation is related to the principle of moral autonomy, and how the ideal of self-determination advocated by philosophers of German Idealism shaped pedagogical programs of social and political reform. In the second part of the course, we will explore the relation between alienation and reification in social and political philosophy, starting with Marx and continuing with Arendt and the Frankfurt School. This theoretical journey will offer the basis to investigate alienation in relation to self-estrangement, environmental racism, and gender discrimination in selected classics of the twentieth century. We will also consider ways of resisting alienation by applying methodological frameworks inspired by Lugones’ concept of world-traveling.

PHIL445401
Politics and Philosophy
Jiang, You G
Spring 2022
This course examines the notion of an ideal human life, understood as living well in ideal circumstances. This notion is at once familiar and puzzling. On the one hand, we all have some conception of living well – i.e., happiness, flourishing, the good life. And we recognize some circumstances as inimical to human flourishing, such as conditions of famine, poverty, oppression, and exploitation. Moreover, we seem to operate with some idea of good circumstances whenever we wish good fortune for our loved ones, or whenever we work to make our societies more supportive of human well-being. But on closer inspection, the notion of ideal circumstances raises a number of questions. What would human life look like in utopian conditions? Would humans still work and labor, or would we pass our lives entirely in leisure?
Could our lives still have meaning and purpose, if there were nothing in our circumstances to struggle against? Would we still need virtues like courage and perseverance, with nothing to fear or overcome? And what about death? Is it the ultimate non-ideal circumstance that might be overcome in some future utopia? This course considers such questions in relation to the notion of an ideal human life. We will read a range of philosophical texts, from Aristotle to Thomas More to contemporary thinkers. We will also examine film and works of imaginative literature by writers such as H.G. Wells.

Far from being monolithic and repetitive, the Middle Ages were a creative period during which multiple solutions were tried to make sense of the world and of human life. The legacy of Antiquity, the philosophic and scientific knowledge of the time, and religious views were combined in original syntheses. The aim of the course is to provide a picture of this diversity, through a study of the main problems that a wide range of authors (Christian thinkers from St. Augustine to Ockham, but also Islamic and Jewish philosophers) faced. Medieval philosophy was an important step in the development of human thought. Discovering it will be essential to your philosophical education. This course will especially highlight the results, in metaphysics, theory of knowledge, and ethics, which medieval thinkers created and transmitted to modern times. This course will especially highlight the ideas, in metaphysics, ethics, and epistemology, that medieval thinkers created and transmitted to modern times. This is a course about the philosophical, psychological, and spiritual understandings. Buddhist approaches to philosophical anthropology, epistemology, ethics, and metaphysics are related to practices of meditation, phenomenological investigation, and philosophical and psychological analyses. Reading in classical and modern Buddhism and in a few areas of modern psychology that draw on Buddhism. Weekly writing, active discussion, two short papers, one longer paper.

We will discuss articles and chapters drawn from the writings of recent thinkers including Elizabeth Anscombe, Elio Di Nucci, John Finnis, Philippa Foot, Frances Kamm, Jeff MacMahan, Alison McIntyre, T. M. Scanlon, Judith Thomson, and others. A midterm and a final examination will comprise the course’s assignments.

The Aristotelian Ethics Gurtler, Gary
Spring 2022
This course has recently been added for the fall. For students interested in Aristotle’s Nicomachean Ethics, this course is for you! It consists of a close reading of the whole of the Nicomachean Ethics beginning with ethical virtue (Books II-IX) and ending with happiness (Books I and X). I have found that a student’s understanding of Aristotle’s ethical concepts is enhanced when he/she considers those concepts in relation to leading figures in Ancient Greek literature. Thus, occasionally we will discuss some of Homer’s Iliad and Sophocles’ Oedipus Tyrannus to consider how some of the following issues relate to Achilles, Hektor, Paris, Oedipus, and Jocasta. What does it mean to have an ethical virtue (or vice), to engage in involuntary actions, to be responsible, courageous, good-tempered, truthful, temperate, continent, incontinent, and happy? Since the course will be run seminar style, students are expected to participate generously in classroom discussions.

An introduction to the powerful ways the logical forms woven into deductive reasoning and language can be analyzed using abstract symbolic structures. The study of these structures is not only relevant for understanding effective reasoning, but also for exploring the Anglo-American analytic philosophical tradition and foundations of mathematics, computer science, and linguistics. Philosophically interesting properties about logical systems will be explored, including the task of proving whether a logical system is complete and consistent. A number of interesting topics of twentieth-century logic will be briefly considered, such as set theory, Russell's paradox, and Goedel's theorems.

Plato’s Republic DeChiara-Queenzer, Deborah Spring 2022
Welcome to one of Plato’s greatest dialogues, the Republic. As a Platonic dialogue, the Republic has it all: an aporetic beginning (Book I), an ideal state, philosopher-kings, the theory of forms, degenerative states and souls, true and pseudo pleasures, and a great myth. In defense of a life of justice over injustice, this text involves ethics, politics, epistemology, psychology, and metaphysics. Classes will be run seminar style, so it expected that students participate generously in classroom discussions. Hegel’s Philosophy of Spirit Magni, Elisa Spring 2022
This course is dedicated to Hegel’s philosophy of Geist, which is often translated in English as “spirit,” “mind,” or “collective cultural mindset.” However, the full meaning of Geist in Hegel’s philosophy comprises a more fine-grained and richer development of affective, psychological, and practical elements. Drawing on Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit as well as on the sections on the Philosophy of Spirit of Hegel’s Encyclopaedia, this course will explore the main philosophical questions that surround the dimension of Geist in both Hegel's philosophy and contemporary debates, including Hegel's departure from transcendental philosophy and the nature-spirit relation, the novelty of Hegel's philosophical anthropology, the problem of recognition, and the quest for absolute knowledge.

The Great Conversation Kreeft, Peter J Spring 2022
A one-semester crash course in the history of philosophy covering the 100 greatest philosophers both historically and systematically (logically), emphasizing the ongoing story of issues and arguments among them. The professor’s text (SOCRATES’ CHILDREN) is about 1000 pages long.

PHIL667001
Technology and Culture Griffith, William Spring 2022
This interdisciplinary course will first investigate the social, political, psychological, ethical, and spiritual aspects of the Western cultural development with a special emphasis on scientific and technological metaphors and narratives. We will then focus on the contemporary world, examining the impact of our various technological creations on cultural directions, democratic process, the world of work, quality of life, and especially on the emergent meanings for the terms “citizen” and “ethics” in contemporary society. Students will explore technologies in four broad and interrelated domains: (1) computer, media, communications, and information technologies, (2) biotechnology, (3) globalization, and (4) environmental issues.

Phenomenology and Psychoanalysis Bleich, Jeffrey Spring 2022
This seminar will concentrate on the topic of the child’s relation with others, as understood by Freud and Merleau-Ponty. The topic will also be an occasion to explore the themes of desire, language, and what Merleau-Ponty calls the “intersubjectivity before intersubjectivity.” In addition to important texts by these two authors, we will also draw on shorter pieces by, e.g., E. Husserl, J. Lacan, and H. Wallen. Students should have familiarity with the fundamentals of phenomenology and Freudian psychoanalysis.

PHIL726001
Hermeneutics of Hospitality Kearney, Richard Spring 2022
This graduate seminar explores the hermeneutics of hospitality and the gift. It involves close readings of the following: Paul Ricoeur’s philosophy of linguistic and narrative hospitality in his later writings on translation; Jacques Derrida’s deconstructive notions of ‘hospitality’ and the 'gift' in Of Hospitality; and Julia Kristeva’s psychoanalytic account of hosting aliens in Strangers to Ourselves. The seminar will conclude with a discussion of carnal hospitality as a process of peace and justice. We will also refer to the recent phenomenologies of the gift in Jean-Luc Marion and Marcel Henaff. PHIL740101
Philosophy and the Pedagogy of Service II Byrne, Patrick; Fried, C G
Spring 2022
Part II of Graduate PULSE (3 credits per semester, two semester sequence): In this two-semester course, the student will learn both the theory and practice of teaching a Philosophy service-learning course. The student will attend an undergraduate section of PULSE, doing the same readings as the undergraduates and working in a service placement for four hours a week. The student will also attend a bi-weekly seminar with other graduate students in the course and the graduate PULSE instructor, doing readings in the pedagogy of service learning, philosophy of education, and related fields. In consultation with the section instructor, the student will also serve as a writing mentor to undergraduates in the class. Requirements will include short reflection and exploratory papers, similar to the undergraduates, and a final research paper each semester. The first semester will focus on philosophy of education and on the pedagogy of service-learning; the second semester will focus on applied philosophical issues raised by specific service placements, either in the ethics of engaged service work or on policy questions connected to the service. Enrollment requires the permission of the undergraduate section instructor, the instructor for the graduate course, and the Director of the PULSE Program.

PHIL743001
Kant’s Critique of the Traditional Metaphysics in his Post-Critical Writings Basile, Giampiero
Spring 2022
We will study Kant’s Critique of Pure Reason, Kant intended to ground metaphysics on a new foundation. This new foundation aimed at limiting, in the first instance, the claims of rationalist dogmatism of Wolffan and Leibnizian mould to a speculative metaphysics. In addition to this, the part desistroning of the transcendental philosophy of Kant is a critique of knowledge, the foundational operation of the first Critique of Pure Reason. Kant retorts to his opponents, two are particularly important: On a discovery whereby any new critique of pure reason is to be made superfluous by an older one (1790) and What real progress has metaphysics made in Germany since the time of Leibniz and Wolff? (1793/1804). Both works are related by a deep foundational operation of the first Critique involved a pars construens: the foundation of the system of Leibniz and Wolffan metaphysics in Germany. In particular, the philosopher Johann August Eberhard and the Prussian Academy of Sciences itself promoted an active campaign against the Kantian thought, in defense of the system of Leibniz and Wolff. Among the writings in which Kant returns to his opponents, two are particularly important: On a discovery whereby any new critique of pure reason is to be made superfluous by an older one (1790) and What real progress has metaphysics made in Germany since the time of Leibniz and Wolff? (1793/1804). Both works are related by a deep systematic unity and constitute, in some ways, an attempt by Kant to make an assessment of his own critical philosophy and to highlight the most original points of his thinking.

Hegel’s Philosophy of Spirit DEPT
Spring 2022
This course is dedicated to Hegel’s philosophy of Geist, which is often translated in English as “spirit,” “mind,” or “collective cultural mindset.” However, the full meaning of Geist in Hegel’s philosophy comprises a more fine-grained and richer development of affective, psychological, and practical elements. Drawing on Hegel’s Phenomenology of Spirit as well as on the sections on the Philosophy of Spirit of Hegel’s Encyclopaedia, this course will explore the main philosophical questions that surround the dimension of Geist in both Hegel’s philosophy and contemporary debates, including Hegel’s departure from transcendental philosophy and the nature-spirit relation, the novelty of Hegel’s philosophical anthropology, the problem of recognition, and the quest for absolute knowledge.

PHIL779901
Aristotle on Science and the Sciences Wians, William R
Spring 2022
Scholars increasingly appreciate the profound connections between Aristotle’s philosophical positions in works such as the Ethics, De Anima, and Metaphysics and his theory of scientific knowledge, its conditions and methods. Knowledge may be logical, ethical, or physical; it may be practical, productive, or theoretical; it may be mathematical, physical, or theological; and while some things are more knowable to us, others are more knowable in themselves. Whether in psychology, metaphysics, ethics, or natural science, Aristotle’s epistemological and methodological commitments determine his starting points, shape the exposition, and decisively influence the outcome of his investigations.

Platonic Theories of Knowledge Gurtler, Gary
Spring 2022
The purpose of this course will be twofold: to explore Platonic conceptions of perception and memory in the Theaetetus and dialectic in the Sophist; and to investigate what Plotinus does with this Platonian inheritance in his major study of the soul and its way of knowing. Both philosophers show the intersection of perception and intellectual knowledge in a way that is essential for understanding the Platonic project as a whole and especially the possibilities and limits of human knowledge.

Readings in Theory Newmark, Kevin Spring 2022 Conducted in English
Open to undergraduates with permission of instructor only
Fulfills a Ph.D. requirement in Romance Languages and Literatures. This course is organized as an introduction to the reading of literary theory for graduate students in various disciplines. Its aim is to develop an awareness of and sensitivity to the specific means and consequences of interpreting literary and extra-literary language today. The course allows students to acquire a basic familiarity with some of the most formative linguistic, philosophical, and anthropological antecedents underpinning any attempt to understand and account for the special status reserved for rhetorical language in literature or beyond it. Readings from Saussure, Levi-Strauss, Jakobson, Barthes, Lacan, Ricoeur, Geertz, Austin, Derrida, and de Man, among others.

PHYS110001
Structure of the Universe I Bedell, Kevin Fall 2021
An introductory course directed at non-science majors. Physical principles are developed and applied to our space and astrophysical environment. Topics include structure and evolution of the solar system, physics of the sun and planets, space discoveries, creation and structure of stars and galaxies, relativity and cosmology, extraterrestrial life, and astronomical concepts.

PHYS140001
The Art of Physics Herczynski, Andrzej Fall 2021
This core course is a contemporary prologue to classical physics for students seeking to gain an appreciation of the ethos, scope, methods, and tools of physics, and to reflect on its place among the liberal arts. It explores major physics ideas and paradigms in a broader cultural context, providing historical perspectives from the early Greek astronomy through the scientific revolution. Simultaneously, the aim is to develop practical science skills, including the order-of-magnitude estimates, dimensional analysis, understanding of physics laws, and problem solving techniques. Interdisciplinary connections will be emphasized by inclusion of such topics as the concept of time and examples of applications of mathematics and physics to the visual arts. The course can serve as a preparation for, or a companion to more advanced physics classes.

Foundations of Physics I Kempa, Krzysztof Fall 2021
Recommended laboratory (optional): PHYS2050-2051. First semester of a two-semester algebra-based introductory physics course sequence, primarily for non-science majors, that covers the basic principles of physics. Emphasis is placed on problem-solving to demonstrate the implications of these principles, and to develop analytical skills. This course is similar to PHYS2100 in pace and content but with less emphasis on mathematical technique. First semester covers classical mechanics, including Newton’s laws, energy, rotational motion, fluids, thermal physics, oscillations, waves, and gravitation.

PHYS21002
Introductory Physics I (Calculus) Graf, Michael J
Fall 2021

PHYS21002 is the laboratory course to supplement the lecture course material. First semester of a two-semester calculus-based introduction to physics for those majoring in the physical sciences. Students utilize analytical reasoning combined with mathematical formalism to fully explore the development, consequences and limitations of the classical principles of physics; similar to PHYS2101 in pace and content but at a greater depth appropriate for physical science majors. Class size is limited to promote classroom discussion. Topics cover classical mechanics, including Newton's laws, energy, rotational motion, oscillations, waves, and gravitation.

Fall 2021

This course is an introduction to the phenomena of vibrations and waves that span most of the areas in physics. The basic subject matter includes the following: mechanical vibrations and waves, free and forced vibrations and resonances, coupled oscillations and normal modes, vibration of continuous systems, propagation of mechanical and electromagnetic waves, phase and group velocity, interference and diffraction. The course also covers the basic concepts in first and second order differential equations, matrices, eigenvalues and eigenvectors and Fourier series.

PHYS410001
Quantum Physics I Engelbrecht, Jan Fall 2021

First of a two-semester sequence providing a comprehensive treatment of the principles and applications of non-relativistic quantum mechanics. This semester focuses on basic principles. Topics covered include: historical development of quantum mechanics; the uncertainty principle; the Schrödinger equation and its solution for simple one-dimensional potentials, including constant potentials and the harmonic oscillator; formal presentation of the postulates of quantum mechanics using Dirac notation; commutation relations; basic scattering theory; formulation of the Schrödinger equation in three-dimensions, central potentials, orbital angular momentum, and the hydrogen atom; spin angular momentum and the addition of angular momenta.

PHYS454501
Condensed Matter Physics Ma, Qiong
Fall 2021

Condensed matter physics concerns all aspects of the physics of "condensed" materials, that is, solids, liquids, gels, and plasma. It is the science behind many technologically-relevant applied and integrated science and engineering fields. This course primarily covers the solid state, starting with crystal lattices and their vibrations (phonons), and descriptions of conductors, metals, semiconductors, insulators, and superconductors. It covers in some detail the electrical, magnetic, optical, and thermal properties of materials, and introduces the student to noncrystalline solids and so-called "soft condensed matter."
This course is highly recommended for majors considering graduate study in physics. The results of classical thermodynamics are deduced from a statistical basis, including the concepts of temperature and entropy, and the three laws of thermodynamics. Applications to ideal and real gases. Basic elements of statistical mechanics, including the canonical ensemble, partition function, equipartition theorem and Maxwell velocity distribution. Simple application of Maxwell-Boltzmann, Bose-Einstein, and Fermi-Dirac Statistic.

Introduction to Physics II (Calculus) Alfaro Castro, Wilber A
Spring 2022
PHYS2051 is the laboratory course to supplement the lecture course material. Second semester of a calculus-based introduction to physics primarily for biology majors and premedical students. The development and application of classical physical principles are covered, and students are introduced to more advanced mathematical techniques to extend these applications. Emphasis is placed on problem-solving to better understand the implications of these principles, as well as to develop analytical skills. Topics are electrostatics, electrical circuits, magnetism, electromagnetism and electromagnetic waves, topics in physical optics, and basic concepts of special relativity and quantum physics.

PHYS220101
Introductory Physics II (Calculus) Zejlikovic, Ilija
Spring 2022
PHYS2101 is an elective for Physics majors.. This course introduces students to a variety of numerical methods and then applies these methods to solve a broad range of scientific problems. These problems include examples from physics as well as several other disciplines, including chemistry, mathematics, economics, and finance. Numerical techniques for solving problems expressed in... terms of matrix, differential and integral equations will be developed. Other topics will include statistical sampling and Fourier and Laplace transforms.

PHYS897501
Many Body Physics DEPT
Spring 2022
Many Body Physics is the study of matter when interactions matter. This is a very rich subject area and it is impossible to cover all of them. The goal of this Many Body Physics course is to focus on a few theoretical techniques including, e.g., Greens Functions and Feynman Diagrams that provide a unified view of these areas. These techniques can be used to derive some of the more familiar theoretical results for many body systems, the Hartree-Fock approximation, the random phase approximation (RPA), the kinetic equation, and response functions to name a few. These techniques will be applied to a number of interacting systems that could include, Quantum Fluids (Fermi and Bose Fluids), Graphene, Superconductors/Superfluids, and Ferromagnetic metals.

George Washington. It seeks to illumine his character and also to understand his role in the formation of the new American polity, regarding both its virtues and flaws. As the country’s first president he led the effort to forge an enduring national government. How did he succeed so brilliantly in those efforts? Yet even as he was fighting for and presiding over a republic ostensibly dedicated to liberty and equality he abetted a system that perpetuated bondage and inequality. By the end of his life he controlled over 500 slaves. He bought, sold, and rented them. He was a full participant in a culture that subordinated women. This course will scrutinize Washington’s public life—as general and politician; his private life—as slaveholder, husband and friend; and the complex interplay between his public and private personas. To better understand his thought processes and his presentation of self it will make extensive use of his speeches and letters as well as contemporary descriptions and assessments of him. The details of his life are most richly captured in Ron Chernow’s biography of him, from which students will read. This scrutiny will also help to explain Washington’s own role in creating the mythical status he has come to enjoy.

Introduction to Comparative Politics McGraw, Sean D
Fall 2021
This course is open to majors and non-majors. This course is class restricted to freshmen and sophomores. This course provides an overview of the political science subfield of Comparative Politics. Comparative Politics is the study of domestic politics among the 200 plus countries around the world. The class introduces students to three features of Comparative Politics: (1) comparative research design and the comparative method; (2) major theoretical themes in comparative politics; and (3) sampling of case studies comparing politics in selected countries of the world.

The Cost of Free Speech Bayles, Martha
Fall 2021
Class-restricted to juniors and seniors. This course will focus on the challenge of preserving the Western ideal of free speech in a world where democratic governments seem paralyzed by political and cultural polarization; powerful tech companies have become reluctant censors; authoritarian regimes deploy artificial intelligence and the internet of things for surveillance, censorship, and propaganda; and Western governments seem poised to do the same. The goal is to help you situate the classic debate over free speech in both the broader historical context and the contemporary landscape.

Policy and Politics in the U.S. Melnick, Rowell S
Fall 2021
This course is designed to acquaint students with the major features of American policymaking at the national level by engaging in primary research and extensive memo-writing on selected policy issues. Each student will be expected to become familiar with at least three policy areas, understanding existing government policies and understanding tradeoffs and paradoxes; proposing intellectually defensible and politically feasible reforms; and suggesting political strategies for enacting these reforms. Possible topics include social security, environmental regulations, federal aid and mandates for education, affirmative action, welfare, and the use of public lands.

Political Institutions in the Age of Populism: Parties, Voters, and Elections Marcesse, Thibaud
This course probes the role of women in American politics and the efforts that have been made on behalf of the collective political interests of women. We consider gender differences among citizens in public opinion, political participation, and vote choices and gender differences in the experiences and comportment of political leaders. Finally, we analyze the politics of a number of public policies having a special impact on women—among them, employment discrimination and other workplace issues, child care, equal opportunity in education, sexual harassment, and sexual violence.

This course offers an overview of political institutions such as political parties and elections as democracies face a populist challenge in areas as diverse as Western Europe, Latin America, and Asia. After reviewing the theoretical and historical foundations for party politics and party systems, the course will examine the ways in which political parties reach out to voters in countries with different institutional legacies, in industrialized countries as well as in post-colonial democracies in the Global South, whether through programmatic platforms or political quid pro quos (such as vote buying and patronage). The course will also explore the rise of contemporary populist politics and how this brand of politics challenges traditional party-voter linkages and contributes to the erosion of democratic norms.
and others poor? Why do some communities have few resources while their neighbors have a multicultural and diverse foreign population? Why do people migrate? How do host states and societies react to an increasingly multicultural and diverse foreign population? How does inequality affect politics and vice versa? To answer these questions, we will start by critically examining what development is and how it can be measured. Then we will move on to examine theories linking politics to development. We will explore the effects of elections and democracy? How do historical legacies impact contemporary politics? The goal of this course is to provide students with analytical tools to understand a number of questions that are of interest to contemporary politics in Africa. Using the methodologies of comparative politics, we will examine both broad cross-national patterns and focused case studies in this class.

The Politics of Japan and the Republic of Korea Hayao, Kenji Fall 2021 This course is restricted to sophomores, juniors, and seniors only. This course provides an introduction to the comparative politics, we will examine both broad cross-national patterns and focused case studies in this class. Colonies, migrations, wars, world cups and terrorism... For over two centuries, the republics, kingdoms and empires of Europe have had a complex and occasionally tormented relationship with Islam and the Muslim world. The exchange of ideas, politics and populations has transformed all parties involved. At times serving as a beacon of freedom and enlightenment, at other times Europe's relationship with its citizens of Muslim origin and its Mediterranean neighbors has been fraught with tensions. This course will examine these relationships through political science and history texts and with the aid of films and novels.

UN and International Security Crawford, Timothy W Fall 2021

The course begins with the League of Nations and the origins of the UN and its key structures. Then we examine the UN's role in collective security, arms control and disarmament, and peacekeeping as these activities were practiced during the Cold War and as they have evolved in recent years. We then turn to UN activities that go beyond treating the symptoms of conflict and aim instead to fight its root causes, such as racism and human rights violations. Finally, we close with an exploration of the meaning of UN legitimacy and the future prospects of the Security Council.

Ideas, Values, and American Foreign Policy Deese, David A Fall 2021

What are the historical roots and contemporary implications of liberalism and nation-building in American foreign policy? In what ways have liberalism and nation-building shaped present foreign policy doctrines and priorities? How have U.S. foreign policy leaders attempted to spread core ideas and institutions to other countries? In particular, how have key American officials understood the relationship between markets and democracy? To what extent might U.S. policies and decisions be expected to spread liberalism to countries in the Middle East? Finally, what can be learned from the continuing cases of Afghanistan and Iraq?

How do states and other actors in the international community manage global challenges?
What are the sources of order in international politics? In the absence of world government, questions about how international rules are made, monitored, and enforced are important and widespread. This course provides an overview of the concept and theories of global governance, with a focus on power, institutions, and norms in contemporary international relations. It then examines the stakeholders, processes, and outcomes of global governance in the context of policy areas such as fragile states and conflict, the global economy, arms control, health, and the environment.

Irish Politics 1916 to Present McGraw, Sean D Fall 2021
Class restricted to sophomores, juniors, and seniors. Ireland, a country rich in history, has undergone dramatic changes in the twentieth century beginning with its fight for independence and culminating in its meteoric rise during the Celtic Tiger years. What explains Ireland's distinctive political trajectory and how does it compare to other European nations? How should we understand the Celtic Tiger, the rapid series of social, economic and political transformations that have occurred within Ireland since the 1990s? This course explores these questions by studying the political actors and institutional settings of Irish politics, the nature of political influence and the shaping of political priorities, and the forces that shape policy outcomes. It will address such critical issues as the legacies of colonialism and civil war, nationalism, democratization, the relationship between the Church and State, the Northern Ireland Troubles and the European Union. While the course focuses on the Republic of Ireland, it will adopt a broad comparative perspective, situating the country both within the wider global context and within the political science literature.

Globalization Christensen, Paul T Fall 2021
This course examines the political, economic, social, and cultural implications of the increasingly integrated world system. The course focuses on conflicting assessments of international institutions (IMF, World Bank, WTO) and political governance; the impact of economic integration; and the effects of globalization on state sovereignty, democracy, and social cohesion. Specific case studies will include: globalization and the environment; globalization, gender, and work; globalization and immigration/migration; globalization and the illicit economy, and anti-globalization social movements and activism.
How have accelerated forces of globalization in recent decades affected national security? This course examines how globalization can amplify, change, and create challenges to state security. Through discussion and written work, this seminar addresses three major questions: (1) How do we define the concept of national security?; (2) How do states understand the complex and changing relationship between globalization and national security?; and (3) How do states respond to old and new national security challenges brought on by increased economic globalization and interdependence? We will explore these three interrelated questions in the context of a number of issue areas, such as conflict, defense procurement, trade, terrorism, and the environment.

POLI352101 Seminar: Globalization and National Security Erickson, Jennifer L Fall 2021

This course examines the role of international public law (the "law of nations") in the world today. It takes as its starting point the academic (and practical) debate about the utility of international law in world politics. From there, we consider the philosophical foundations of law, the sources of international law, and the application of international law in different arenas. In particular, the course will focus on how international law deals with a number of issues, including the connection between domestic and international law and the laws on territory, jurisdiction, human rights, and security, as well as other relevant topics.

POLI352701 Seminar: Terrorism, Insurgency, and Political Violence Krause, Peter J Fall 2021

Terrorism and insurgency dominate the headlines today, but how much do we really know about these forms of political violence? Are they inventions from the modern era, or do they have a deeper past? What drives an individual to join an armed group? Why do some groups choose to employ violence, while others do not? Are terrorism and insurgency effective political strategies? Just how significant is the threat of terrorism today, in the U.S. and abroad? This course will address these and other questions, while introducing students to relevant analytical frameworks, theories, and cases concerning terrorism, insurgency, and related forms of political violence. In addition to its topical focus, this course could rightly be called a methods course.

Students in the class will learn how to improve their analytical thinking, conduct high quality research, and present an effective argument, both orally and in writing. They will learn the potential and pitfalls of theories of political violence through constant analysis and engagement with the history of terrorism and insurgency. By the conclusion of the course, students will emerge not only with a far richer understanding of these issues, but also as more sophisticated consumers, analysts, and producers of knowledge.

POLI360001 Hannah Arendt Wilford, Paul T Fall 2021

Students must have previously taken POLI1041 Fundamental Concepts of Politics. Class restricted to sophomores, juniors, and seniors. This course explores the writings of Hannah Arendt (1906-1975), one of the twentieth century’s most important and controversial political thinkers. We will begin by considering the unprecedented political catastrophe of totalitarianism and Arendt’s analysis of the attempts by Nazi Germany and Stalinist Russia to transform human nature. Following Arendt, we will ask: how could totalitarianism appear in the ostensibly most progressive moment in all of world history? The roots of totalitarianism can be traced to the socio-political philosophy of the 19th century and to the politics of the French Revolution, when ideological goals were first advanced through the systematic application of state terror. In the second half of the course, we will consider Arendt’s positive response to the political, philosophical, and moral crisis of our time, concluding with a careful reading of The Human Condition. We will explore the tension between politics and philosophy that runs through the history of the West and consider Arendt’s distinctive account of political action, public space, collective deliberation, and normative judgement, as well as her defense of the primacy of politics.

Restricted to juniors, seniors, and graduate students only. Not open to students who have previously taken POLI2330. This course will examine immigration as a social as well as an economic process, with particular attention to its political and policy dimensions. Special attention will be paid to the interaction between immigrants and contemporary American institutions, and to how the contemporary context differs from earlier periods in our history. The various dimensions (social, cultural, economic, and political) of assimilation will be examined. Particular emphasis will be placed on undocumented immigration as well as the group competition and conflict engendered by immigration generally. The course will culminate in an examination of policy responses to the continuing controversy over immigration.

POLI449601 Democracy and Political Mediation in the Global South Marcques, Thibaud Fall 2021

This seminar proposes to explore the variation in democratic outcomes across the Global South. Why have some states remained democratic while others have experienced various forms of authoritarianism? Why are political parties stronger in some countries than others? The course will start with a discussion of institutional legacies such as colonialism to account for the transition to and consolidation (or not) of democracy. Looking at empirical evidence from different regions, such as Latin American and the Caribbean, Africa, South Asia and the Middle East, the course will provide a dynamic and comparative overview of democratic institutions, such as political parties and party systems, discuss informal linkages between citizens and political parties, review the broader implications of development for democratic stabilization and look at the impact of institutional reforms such as decentralization on political participation and the exercise of citizenship.

This course is class restricted to juniors, seniors, and graduate students only. This class offers an analytical perspective on the strategic conditions of post-Cold War East Asia. It examines the regional political structure, the strategic characteristics of the region's great power relationships--U.S.-China relations and the rise of China--and the implications of great power relations for the conflicts on the Korean peninsula, in the Taiwan Strait, and in the South China Sea, and the role of alliance relationships in regional diplomacy. From these different perspectives, the class seeks an understanding of the sources of state behavior in East Asia and the prospects for regional stability and instability.

POLI723201
Quantitative Methods in Political Science Hopkins, David A
Fall 2021
This course will fulfill an elective course in your political science graduate degree program. This course provides an introduction to quantitative methods commonly employed in the social sciences to make descriptive and causal inferences, with a particular focus on the general linear model used in bivariate and multivariate regression analyses. It requires no previous statistical experience and emphasizes practical applications of the concepts introduced. Students will have the opportunity to conduct an original quantitative analysis to address an empirical research question of their choice.

Modern State Easter, Gerald M Fall 2021
This seminar examines the modern state in comparative historical perspective. The focus is on the relationship between war, the state and society. The course considers how modern warfare contributed to the rise of the modern state as the principal form of organization in world politics. In addition, it seeks to demonstrate how the state gives shape to modern society.
Finally, the course addresses the issue of the decline of the modern state in response to post-modern military and economic challenges.

Use of Force Ross, Robert S Fall 2021
This is a graduate seminar in international politics. It assumes knowledge of the fundamental concepts of the international political system and of state behavior. It offers an in-depth discussion of one aspect of international politics--how and why states use force to achieve their objectives. In so doing, it addresses the use of force in its multiple dimensions, including war, deterrence, coercive diplomacy, and terrorism, and its role in contemporary international politics.

Global Public Goods and Cooperation in International Politics Deese, David A
Some of our most urgent challenges, from global warming and international financial crises to nuclear proliferation, global epidemics or disruption of the internet, can be understood as "global public goods." These require international actors to bargain, coordinate and collaborate in reaching effective responses. This seminar investigates the nature of public goods and collective action in order to help understand these pressing challenges, possible responses to them, and how politics both limits and opens opportunities for policy formation. It begins with prevalent theories about the production of public goods, from the local to transnational and global, and analysis of their governance. It then studies in depth three case studies, providing international financial stability, slowing the spread of nuclear weapons worldwide, and mitigating global climate disruption. It concludes by examining the implications of rising socio-economic inequality in major countries worldwide.

The class will undertake a close reading of Hegel's Phenomenology of Spirit. The course will focus especially on the political and religious dimensions on the Phenomenology and how the relation between these two fundamental human interests shapes the desire of consciousness to be at home in the world. Ultimately, we will try to understand Hegel's audacious claim to have brought philosophy "nearer to the form of science, to where it can lay aside the title 'love of knowing' and be actual knowing."

Making the Modern Mind: Morality Hanley, Ryan P Spring 2022
How were the mathematical and scientific developments of the seventeenth century related to the philosophical and religious concepts, and how do these mathematical and philosophical innovations continue to shape the ways in which we think and act today? The world we live in today has been profoundly shaped by specific mathematical, technological and philosophical innovations that came at a crucial point in our history. But what were the most important of these, and are we better or worse off for them? Boston College students will engage these questions by going back to the origin of the modern world in the seventeenth century to study firsthand the birth of both modern algebra and calculus as well as modern moral philosophy via close study of three of the intellectual giants of the age: Descartes, Pascal and Leibniz.

For majors only. Restricted to freshmen and sophomores only. This course examines the politics and government of modern states, identifying what is distinctively modern (e.g., representative government, political parties), including in the survey both democratic and non-democratic nations. We will consider the nation-state itself—the most typical modern political arrangement—as well as efforts to "transcend" the nation (e.g., the European Union, the United Nations). We will examine the kinds of public policies that modern states adapt, and consider their consequences. Although this is not a class in international politics, some attention will be paid to the relations among modern states, including war and its causes.

The question of virtue lies at the heart of every civilization. So does the question of gender. Historically, some virtues, such as bodily strength, courage in battle, self-control, rational intellect, and leadership, have been considered masculine and superior to other virtues considered good and feminine, such as modesty, industry, hurlurgency, nurturing, and obedience. Is this correlation of virtues and gender natural, rooted in biological sex; or is it socially constructed? Did it ever have any redeeming aspects, or was it always unjust and oppressive? How does the modern ideal of gender equality affect our understanding of the virtues? These questions will be addressed throughout a wide range of readings, films, and open-minded class discussion.

How do citizens form opinions about politics, and how do these attitudes influence their participation in political life? This course addresses questions about the most prominent sources of influence on the political orientations of individuals, including personality effects, socialization, interpersonal dynamics, cognitive biases, and the news media. We then apply these findings to the most common forms of political behavior, including party affiliation, electoral participation, activism, and protest, aiming to explain why different citizens support different political candidates and causes as well as why some members of the public engage extensively in political activity while others remain uninvolved.

Conflict and Polarization in American Politics Hopkins, David A Spring 2022
It was once common for observers to note—and sometimes bemoan—the relative lack of partisan and ideological polarization in American politics, yet many now believe that Americans have become too polarized. This course examines the nature of political differences in the public, explaining how distinctions of race, sex, social class, religion, ideology, and issue positions are associated with differing choices at the ballot box. We will consider whether the strong ideological conflict now evident in elite institutions reflects similar divisions among citizens, and investigate whether the United States has in fact split into “red” and “blue” partisan territory.

Environmental Politics and Policy Hartney, Michael T Spring 2022
This course provides an overview of environmental politics in the U.S., with an emphasis on the ways in which environmental policy is developed and implemented. We begin by analyzing the historical development of environmental policy in the U.S. paying close attention to how the environment as an issue has evolved from the time of the country’s founding through to the modern environmental movement. We then examine specific case studies related to contemporary policy challenges. Whether climate change, nonpoint source pollution, or traditional environmental concerns, today citizens are confronting the consequences of rapid economic growth and development. Along the way we will consider the key actors that shape environmental outcomes including: Congress, the EPA, industry lobbyists, state and local environmental agencies, advocacy groups, the science community, and the private sector.

Although national politics captures most media and public attention, state and local governments may well have a greater impact on citizens’ daily lives. Consequently, this course examines the key institutions and processes that shape politics and policymaking at the state and local levels of government. Specific attention will be paid to how American sub-national governments raise revenues, allocate and manage their resources (zoning laws, regulatory takings), and provide important governmental services (public schools, fire and police protection, parks). Along the way, students will be introduced to and asked to evaluate key concepts and theories relating to the operation of sub-national governments (e.g., federalism, Tiebout sorting, the “homevoter hypothesis”).

The course explores origins of Muslim majority societies and political systems in the Middle East. It covers the formative era of Islamic civilization, and traces the diffusion of the Middle Eastern Islamic paradigm, culminating in the Ottoman system, and explores the social and political disruptions caused by the breakup of Muslim empires and establishment of European economic, political and cultural domination. It addresses how these forces led to the creation of national states and changes in class structure, and explores how the failure of Western forms of modernization and political organization led to demands for the formation of new political communities based on the revival of Islamic principles. Discussions will center Islam's compatibility with liberalism, secularization, modernity, democracy, and terrorism. Recent
This course examines the relationship between natural resources and politics, with an emphasis on developing countries. The first half of the semester focuses on the paradox of plenty: when and why does wealth in natural resources lead to negative outcomes for governance, democracy, and development? In the second half of the semester, we will examine scarcity and conflict. How should scarce resources such as good land and clean water be managed? When does competition over resources devolve into conflict? Is there something special about diamonds? In examining these questions (and others), we will seek to understand how these issues are conditioned by policies and political institutions.

In the Muslim world today, more than ever there is an effort to locate the key figures of Islamic civilization and to situate them in a contemporary context. Alfarabi (d. 950) founded the main tradition of philosophy in the Islamic world. Regarded by his successors such as Avicenna (Ibn Sina), Averroes (Ibn Rushd) and Maimonides as the "Second Teacher" or greatest philosophical figure following the death of Aristotle, Alfarabi was understood to have been the leading authority in two fields of study, namely, logic and political science. This is a one-semester readings and research course directed by a Political Science faculty member that culminates in a long paper or equivalent.

Course Title: Honors Seminar: Pre-Modern Politics

Course Description: This course examines the wide variation of pre-modern political forms and practices. It identifies the common dynamics of war, wealth, religion, which drove the political transformation of human society from pre-modern kinship communities to early modern proto-states. Comparative case studies are used to illustrate these processes. The cases are drawn mainly from the peoples of Eurasia and the Americas, where occurred the historic clashes between early modern territorial-based states and pre-modern stateless societies that have since shaped today's world.
