It’s cover letter season: Here’s how to stand out

Writing a persuasive letter can tip the scale in your favor, especially for a job that requires strong communication and writing skills. On the other hand, nothing says “I’m not that interested” more than a generic cover letter. Seasoned recruiters spot them in a second. To write a good cover letter, start by looking at the ‘requirements’ or ‘qualifications’ section of the job description. Then, give two short anecdotes showing that you have those skills. Check out our career advising site for more details on how to write a stellar cover letter.

Think Outside of the CSOM Bubble

Business students can gain valuable experience by considering non-traditional internships that allow them to apply their skills in unique, dynamic, or unconventional settings. Your skills and problem-solving are needed in every setting imaginable. Check out these suggestions.
