Undocumented immigrants residing in the United States naturally have barriers that prevent them from integrating into the greater community. Currently, social integration policies tend to be overlooked and unprioritized. One of the few policies that potentially fosters social integration is the municipal ID program. The municipal ID program is intended to provide formal identification for all city residents regardless of their immigration status, residential status (or lack thereof), or gender identity. An official identification not only gives people access to basic services, but it also establishes a certain confidence in communication between law enforcement and government officials, which is essential to the social integration of undocumented immigrants. This research will analyze New York City’s municipal ID program, the IDNYC, and will examine how the IDNYC socially integrates its undocumented immigrants.
